

This is an accepted version of the below article published in the Cambridge Journal of Postcolonial Literary Inquiry Vol. 2, Issue 2, 266-272. Available at: <http://dx.doi.org/10.1017/pli.2015.17>

Accepted version downloaded from SOAS Research Online: <http://eprints.soas.ac.uk/22089/>

Whose amnesia? Literary modernity in multilingual South Asia

Francesca Orsini

SOAS, University of London

email: fo@soas.ac.uk

office: Dept. of Languages and Cultures of South Asia, SOAS, Thornhaugh Street, Russell Square, London WC1H 0XG

Abstract:

The debate over the impact of British colonialism and “colonial modernity” in India has hinged around questions of epistemic and aesthetic rupture. Whether in modern poetry, art, music, in practically every language and region intellectuals struggled with the artistic traditions they had inherited and condemned them as decadent and artificial. But this is only part of the story. If we widen the lens a little and consider print culture and orature more broadly, vibrant regional print and performance cultures in a variety of Indian languages, and the publishing of earlier knowledge and aesthetic traditions belie the notion that English made India into a province of Europe, peripheral to London as the centre of world literature. Yet nothing of this new fervour of journals, associations, literary debates, of new genres or theatre and popular publishing, transpires in Anglo-Indian and English journals of the period, whose occlusion of the Indian-language stories produced ignorance, distaste, indifference— those “technologies of recognition” (Shu-Mei Shih) that produce “the West” as the agent of recognition and “the rest” as the object of recognition, in representation”.

Keywords:

Indian literature, literary modernity, colonialism, cosmopolitanism

Bio:

Francesca Orsini is Professor of Hindi and South Asian literature at SOAS. Her research spans contemporary Hindi literature, Hinglish, the cultural history of love, Hindi and Urdu publishing in the colonial period, the longue durée of literary multilingualism in north India, and a “bottom-up” approach to world literature.

Muhsin al-Musawi’s article on “The Republic of Letters: Arab Modernity?” finds strong echoes in South Asian scholarship and public debates. Much of the debate over the impact of British colonialism, with its various phases and attitudes towards Indian culture, and “colonial modernity” has hinged over questions of epistemic and aesthetic rupture. Was English literature a “mask of conquest;” were Indian writers “crushed by English poetry;” did English-educated Indian intellectuals suffer from “amnesia” of pre-colonial intellectual traditions; did they internalize colonial views about Indian culture and the “Indian psyche”?¹ For a couple of decades of intense and fruitful enquiry into colonial discourse and its nationalist appropriations and transformations by Indian intellectuals and artists, the answer was a resounding yes. Studies of modern Indian poetry, art, music, etc. showed that in practically every language and region, intellectuals struggled with the artistic traditions they had inherited and that constituted their habitus and condemned them as decadent, artificial, escapist, and even harmful in that they took you away from art’s proper duty, couched explicitly or implicitly in Arnoldian terms, to be useful and improve the individual and collective moral sense.

¹ See Gauri Vishwanathan, Masks of Conquest: Literary studies and British rule in India (London: Faber, 1990); Sudhir Chandra, The Oppressive Present: Literature and social consciousness in colonial India (New Delhi: Oxford University Press, 1992); Ganesh Devy, After Amnesia: Tradition and change in Indian literary criticism (London: Sangham, 1992); Ashis Nandy, The Intimate Enemy: Loss and recovery of self under colonialism (New Delhi: Oxford University Press, 1988).

Moreover, to take North India as an example after the initial British engagement with Sanskrit, Persian, and even Arabic (with the Calcutta Madrassa and Benares Sanskrit College²), the colonial-modern turn towards vernacular languages as the proper vehicles of culture as well as knowledge and administration, led to a linguistic shift towards Urdu and Hindi instead of Persian and Sanskrit. The ensuing language controversy over the “real” vernacular of North India was couched on the Hindi side in a strong language of Hindi/Hindu/Indian Self vs. Urdu/Persian/Muslim Other, which matched the growing nationalist historiography of the Sultanate and Mughal period as “dark middle ages” of invasion and of religious and cultural oppression.³ This produced a further estrangement from Persian and the many knowledge traditions that had found expression in that language in India – history, geography, ethnography, poetics, lexicography, religion, philosophy, mysticism, mythology, astrology, astronomy, sciences, arts, flora, fauna, fariery and falconry, cuisine, etc. As for Sanskrit, Sheldon Pollock and a whole team of Sanskritists have investigated “Sanskrit knowledge systems on the even of colonialism” and argued that the two centuries between 1550 and 1750 “witnessed a flowering of intellectual life characterized by, among other features, an increase in the production of texts across disciplines, the rise of a new (or newly reinvigorated) interdisciplinarity, and the introduction of important new discursive practices and conceptual categories. This dynamism lasted until the consolidation of colonial power, whereupon a decline set in that ended the age-old power of Sanskrit learning to shape Indian intellectual history.”⁴ Notable aspects of this investigation have been the emphasis on the newness and dynamism of “late Sanskrit,” and the more than occasional convergence with some Persian knowledge traditions such as philosophy, astronomy, music, poetics. This double shift away from Persian and Sanskrit meant that for a lot of ordinarily educated North Indians the knowledge traditions in those languages became more distant, less accessible, and familiar more in name than in content (“paratexts without texts”). To be true, in several cases translations, particularly from Persian into Urdu, brought earlier traditions like that of ethics and cultured manners (akhlaq, adab) to new strata of Urdu-educated ordinary “respectable” people.⁵

² For Benares Sanskrit College see Michael Dodson, Orientalism, Empire, and National Culture: India, 1770-1880 (New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2007).

³ Francesca Orsini, The Hindi Public Sphere, 1920-1940: Language and Literature in the Age of Nationalism (New Delhi: Oxford University Press, 2002).

⁴ Sheldon Pollock, “Introduction: Working Papers on Sanskrit Knowledge-Systems on the eve of colonialism”. Journal of Indian Philosophy 30 (2002): 431.

⁵ Barbara Metcalf, ed. Moral Conduct and Authority: the place of adab in South Asian Islam (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1984); Farina Mir, “Urdu Akhlaq Literature in Nineteenth-Century India”. Unpublished paper, Simon Digby Memorial Conference, SOAS, London, 9-11 June 2014.

While we can easily consider English as the “new Persian”, the new High language of knowledge, status, and power, the symbolic as well as pragmatic importance the vernaculars acquired as the Herderian “language(s) of the people” meant that in terms of production and circulation English continued to occupy a significant but relatively small part of the cultural field in the colonial period. To imagine that English made India into a province of Europe, peripheral to London as the metropolitan centre, would be to take a very partial, English- and Anglo-Indian centred view of things. This is only one of several stories, as we shall see.

To turn to Musawi’s other argument, about the pre-modern Arabic “republic of letters” that modern Arabic intellectuals unfairly dismissed, in the context of South Asia this has been largely conceptualised, once again by Sheldon Pollock, in terms of Sanskrit (and Persian, Arabic) cosmopolis, with an attendant historical argument about the gradual process of “vernacularization.”⁶ Pollock’s powerful characterisation of Sanskrit as a cosmopolitan language and literary culture has been in conceptualisations of Persian and Arabic as cosmopolitan languages in the wider region.⁷ His definition links languages and polities, literary practices and socio-textual communities:

⁶ See Sheldon Pollock, “The Cosmopolitan Vernacular.” The Journal of Asian Studies 57. 1 (1998): 6-37; “India in the Vernacular Millennium: Literary Culture and Polity, 1000-1500.” Daedalus 127.3 (1998): 41-74; “Cosmopolitan and Vernacular in History.” Public Culture 12.3 (2000): 591–625; and The Language of the Gods in the World of Men: Sanskrit, culture, and power in premodern India (Berkeley: University of California Press, 2006).

cosmopolitan and vernacular can be taken as modes of literary (and intellectual, and political) communication directed toward two different audiences, whom lay actors know full well to be different. The one is unbounded and potentially infinite in extension; the other is practically finite and bounded by other finite audiences, with whom, through the very dynamic of vernacularization, relations of ever-increasing incommunication come into being. We can think of this most readily as a distinction in communicative capacity and concerns between a language that travels far and one that travels little.⁸

Pollock's distinction between cosmopolitan and vernacular maps onto the classic distinction between High and low languages (diglossia), according to which High languages (Sanskrit and Latin in his comparison) are markers of high culture and vehicles of higher forms of knowledge, and historically have been the preserve of specialist individuals and groups, while low languages are/have been used in informal, primarily spoken domains. Pollock spatialises cosmopolitan and vernacular so that the former is potentially universal while the latter travels little. Further, he links them to polities and the agency of rulers and their courts, so that empires and polities with wide ambitions choose cosmopolitan languages while vernaculars mark the emergence of regional, more bounded polities. Finally, he narrates the relationship between cosmopolitan and vernacular in terms of historical supersedence, as a story of vernacularization. Yet the early modern story can also be told as a story of the persistence of the High languages of Sanskrit and Persian in particular, and in fact of the wider dissemination of Persian well into the colonial period. This was a multilingual cultural world, and the archives of Persian, Sanskrit and early modern Hindi/Urdu are best read together, alert to clues of the presence of other languages and voices.⁹ No single language was completely hegemonic. Not just that, but the aesthetic world of the early modern connoisseur (what Katherine Schofield has called the “Mughal rasika”¹⁰), was not just multi-lingual but “inter-medial” and linked music, painting, and poetry.¹¹ Which of these and other aesthetic traditions continued into the colonial period and with which major or subtle shifts is a question that has produced some wonderful scholarship in recent years.¹² Whether and to what extent the rich “intermedial aesthetic” at all survived the onslaught of epistemic/aesthetic colonial and nationalist critiques remains an open question.

⁷ See Stefano Pellò, Tūṭiyān-i Hind: Specchi identitari e proiezioni cosmopolite indo-persiane (1680-1856) (Firenze: Società Editrice Fiorentina, 2012); and Ronit Ricci, Islam Translated: Literature, conversion, and the Arabic cosmopolis of South and Southeast Asia (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2011).

⁸ Pollock, "Cosmopolitan and Vernacular," 593-594.

⁹ Francesca Orsini, “How to do multilingual literary history? Lessons from fifteenth- and sixteenth-century north India.” Indian Economic and Social History Review 49.2 (2012): 225-246.

¹⁰ Katherine Butler Schofield, “The Mughal Rasikas: Patrons – treatise writers – performers.” In F. Orsini and K. Schofield, eds. Tellings and Texts: Music, Literature, and Performance cultures in North India. Cambridge: Open Book Publishers, [2015].

¹¹ Molly E. Aitken, Allison Busch and Katherine Schofield, “Modernity’s Challenge To India’s Aesthetic Traditions: Rajput painting, Hindi poetry and Hindustani music.” Public lecture, King’s College London, 23 October 2014.

Yet English did not become completely hegemonic, either. As suggested above, the narrative of colonial modernity and of English displacing everything else occludes first, a great variation in regional colonial cultures (all multilingual to some extent), and second, stories of creative appropriation such as Shakespeare on the Parsi stage, where “English influence” was refracted through new technologies, existing performance and poetic traditions to produce a new and hybrid theatrical language. If we widen the lens a little and consider print culture and performance, regional studies have shown that factors such as the social, intellectual and religious composition of local elites and literate groups, their degree of Anglicization and/or command of other Indian languages, their entrepreneurship and support for printing activities, local caste dynamics, the greater or lesser activism of missionaries and of Indian Christians, and so on, produced significantly different print cultures in Tamil, Bengali, Urdu, Marathi, Gujarati, Hindi, Konkani, Punjabi, and Sinhala, to name but a few. In her study of Marathi print culture, for example, Veena Naregal has highlighted its upper-caste dominance and exclusivity, and shown that its virulent anti-lower-caste discourse was all the sharper because of the assertion of lower-caste voices in Western India, so much earlier than in other areas of the subcontinent. As a result, she argues, “by the late 1870s, when modern Marathi found its literary voice, lower-caste groups did not identify with the public defined by upper-caste intellectuals;” they formed “a distinct counter-public” and used “popular expressive forms” for mobilisation.¹³ Bengali book culture was similarly shaped by the distance between elite forms of cultural production by the famed bhadralok and the commercial energies of the Battala book quarter. Yet it was taste rather than caste that divided them.¹⁴

¹² Amanda Weidman, Singing the Classical, Voicing the Modern: the postcolonial politics of music in South India (Durham: Duke University Press, 2006); Davesh Soneji, Unfinished Gestures: Devadāsīs, memory, and modernity in South India (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2012); Molly E. Aitken, The Intelligence of Tradition in Rajput Court Painting (New Haven: Yale University Press, 2010); and Allison Busch, Poetry of Kings: The Classical Hindi Literature of Mughal India (New York: Oxford University Press, 2011).

Book historians have also shown that nineteenth-century publishers printed Persian, Arabic, and Sanskrit books in large numbers¹⁵ – in some cases Arabic classics were first printed in Calcutta,¹⁶ and in second half of the nineteenth century the Newal Kishore press was the largest producer and distributor of Persian books in Asia. At the opposite end of the spectrum, studies

¹³ Veena Naregal, Language Politics, Elites, and the Public Sphere: Western India under Colonialism (New Delhi: Permanent Black, 2001), p.269.

¹⁴ Anindita Ghosh, Power in Print: Popular publishing and the politics of language and culture in a colonial society, 1778-1905 (New Delhi: Oxford University Press, 2006).

¹⁵ Ulrike Stark, An Empire of Books: the Naval Kishore Press and the diffusion of the printed word in colonial India (Ranikhet: Permanent Black, 2007).

¹⁶ I owe this information to my PhD student Simon Leese, who is working on Arabic literature in nineteenth-century India.

of commercial print culture have, unsurprisingly, noted the prevalence of pre-print genres, the practice of bi-scriptual publishing (in both Nagari and Perso-Urdu scripts) and the increased hybridization between Hindi and Urdu languages and literary traditions in an “inter-ocular” mediascape that included theatre, prints, and popular publishing.¹⁷

Let me end with a point about the maps of world literature and “world” circulation and reception. I have begun to sift through literary journals and reviews in India, and the United States in the late 19c (the Calcutta Review, Books Abroad, Indian Review) and early books on “world literature” to get a sense of early formulations of “world literature” in Anglo-Indian, European, American, and Hindi circles, and how much Indian literature circulated, where it circulated, and how it was received. Apart from a few notable exceptions like the Calcutta Review (est. 1844), which published articles and reviews of orientalist studies and translations of older texts but also gave space to reviews of contemporary Bengali writing, a few Bengali authors in English (including the poet Toru Dutt), and even their articles on English literature. And apart from Joseph-Héliodore-Sagesse-Vertu Garcin de Tassy, who from 1850 to the 1880s compiled annual reports on the state of Hindustani literature, including the latest publications, while sitting in Paris (1871-78)! Apart from these exceptions, other journals “left”

¹⁷ Francesca Orsini, Print and Pleasure: Popular literature and entertaining fictions in colonial north India (Ranikhet: Permanent Black, 2010).

Indian literature to Orientalists. With the result that even if Orientalists working on modern languages like George A. Grierson had good knowledge of contemporary literature and contacts among contemporary writers, the space of modern Indian literature was occupied by writings by Anglo-Indians (= British in India), as in the Indian Review (1883), or by Oriental fictions, often described in the reviews as “giving a vivid picture” or “excellent insight” into the people and places.

In other words, while the 19c in north India witnessed not only the continued cultivation of Persian (and Arabic), Hindi and Urdu literary traditions, but also a new fervour of journals, associations, literary debates and new genres in poetry and prose; and a boom in popular publishing and theatre, nothing of this transpires in journals like the Indian Review, published in Calcutta from 1884. For its editors, who wanted to bring the best of monthly and weekly British and European reviews to distant Indian readers (especially “those living in remote and solitary parts of the Mofussil, where book-clubs are impossible and the larger majority of periodicals are never seen”¹⁸), who paid particular attention to “works published in India”, and who urged Anglo-Indian authors to rise above occasional ditties and “break the fallow ground of imagination and romance that lies untilled around us in the East,"¹⁹ contemporary Indian writing by Indians simply did not exist. And "Home" and the "centre" were definitely located in Britain.

¹⁸ “Ourselves”. Indian Review, I.1 (1883): 4.

This division between Orientalists and Anglo-Indian literary people is brought home well by Rudyard Kipling, who fulfilled and surpassed the Indian Review's expectation of "untilled imagination and romance". Kipling, who left India in 1889, continued to for a quarter of a century to be its authoritative interpreter for audiences "at home" and in the world ("East is East and West is West"), but also of England ("What should they know of England who only England know?"). Kipling's disdain for Indian "educated natives" is well known. He also had little time for Orientalist appreciations of Indian literature: provoked by William Morris's inclusion of the Mahabharata among of the "hundred best books,"²⁰ he quoted from Pratap Chandra Roy's translation of the Mahabharata and commented:

¹⁹ W.T. Webb, "Anglo-Indian Verse". Indian Review, I.1 (1883): 16.

²⁰ "I see by this week P[all] M[all] Gazette that the worthy William Morris has been giving his opinion on the Hundred best books. Lord! Lord! What a Lying world it is. He has gravely stuck down the Mahabharata and I will wager everything I have that he hasn't got the ghost of a conception what he means when he advises the study of that monstrous midden... I see every now and then at home some man who hasn't touched them lifting up his voice in praise of 'the golden mines of Oriental Literature' and I snort;" letter to Cornell Price, 18-27 February 1886 (in Thomas Pinney, Kipling's India: uncollected sketches 1884-88 (London: Macmillan, 1986), 175).

Page upon page might be filled with extracts equally profitless... the wearied reader, who has set forth on his journey of discovery, with the honest intent of exploring the precious mines of Oriental lore, finds his attention wandering and his commonsense revolting at the inanities put before him... To orientalists, the two national epics have their own special value, as the Rig Veda has for students of early forms of religious belief; but the working world of to-day has no place for these ponderous records of nothingness.²¹

Ignorance, distaste, indifference—these are precisely what Shu-Mei Shih has identified as “technologies of recognition,” those “mechanisms in the discursive (un)conscious—with bearings on social and cultural (mis)understandings—that produce “the West” as the agent of recognition and “the rest” as the object of recognition, in representation.” As she points out, it is through these technologies that the literary market and academic discourse such as world literature “selectively and often arbitrarily confer world membership on literatures.”²² The result was books like John Macy’s The Story of World Literature

²¹ Rudyard Kipling, “The Epics of India”, Civil and Military Gazette, 24 August 1886 (cited in Pinney, Kipling’s India, 177-8).

²² Shu-Mei Shih, “Global Literature and the Technologies of Recognition.” In T. D’haen, C. Domínguez and M. Rosendahl Thomsen, eds. World Literature: A Reader (London: Routledge, 2013), 260.

(1927), which covers “Asian Literature” in merely 13 pages out of 500, just after “The Beginnings of Literature,” in a chapter entitled: “The Mysterious East-Chinese-Japanese-Indian-Arabic.” Indian literature consists exclusively of ancient Sanskrit literature, and the only modern author mentioned is Tagore, who is presented as a lonely, little-known voice (remember he had won the Nobel Prize in 1913) and damned with faint praise:

In our own days an Indian poet has arisen whose voice is heard beyond the intellectual frontiers of his faith and language. This is the Bengali Rabindranath Tagore. Something of the bloom and cadence of his verse must inevitably be lost in translation. We are told that he has a delicate sensitive ear for the music of words...²³

In the end, more productive than a critique of modern intellectuals and their “amnesia,” or a historical narrative about the inevitable rise of the juggernaut English (or French) and the obliteration of everything else in their wake, is to be wary of single-strand and monolingual historical narratives (Arabic also existed in a multilingual world, too), and conceive of space, whether local or further-flung/wider, as the “multiplicity of stories so far,” and attend to those stories,

²³ John Macy, The Story of World Literature (London, Bombay, Sidney: George Harap & Co, 1927), 43. Japanese literature is “best interpreted by Lafcadio Hearn.”

and the different configurations they produce.²⁴

References

Aitken, Molly E., The Intelligence of Tradition in Rajput Court Painting (New Haven: Yale University Press, 2010).

Aitken, M.E., A. Busch and K. Butler Schofield, "Modernity's Challenge To India's Aesthetic Traditions: Rajput painting, Hindi poetry and Hindustani music." Public lecture, King's College London, 23 October 2014..

Busch, Allison, Poetry of Kings: The Classical Hindi Literature of Mughal India (New York: Oxford University Press, 2011).

Chandra, Sudhir, The Oppressive Present: Literature and social consciousness in colonial India (New Delhi: Oxford University Press, 1992).

Devy, Ganesh, After Amnesia: Tradition and change in Indian literary criticism (London: Sangham, 1992).

Dodson, Michael, Orientalism, Empire, and National Culture: India, 1770-1880 (New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2007).

Garcin de Tassy, Joseph-Héliodore-Sagesse-Vertu, La langue et la littérature hindoustaniens en 1870 (and 1876, 1877): revue annuelle (Paris: Maisonneuve, 1871-78).

Ghosh, Anindita, Power in Print: Popular publishing and the politics of language and culture in a colonial society, 1778-1905 (New Delhi: Oxford University Press, 2006).

Macy, John, The Story of World Literature (London, Bombay, Sidney: George Harap & Co, 1927).

Massey, Doreen, For Space (London: Sage, 2005, 6th ed.2012).

Metcalf, Barbara D. ed., Moral Conduct and Authority: the place of adab in South Asian Islam (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1984).

Mir, Farina, "Urdu Akhlaq Literature in Nineteenth-Century India". Simon Digby Memorial Conference, SOAS, London, 9-11 June 2014. Unpublished paper.

Nandy, Ashis, The Intimate Enemy: Loss and recovery of self under colonialism (New Delhi: Oxford University Press, 1988).

²⁴ "The multiplicity of stories so far" is Doreen Massey's definition in For Space (London: Sage, 2006, 6th ed.2012), 9.

Naregal, Veena, Language Politics, Elites, and the Public Sphere: Western India under Colonialism (New Delhi, Permanent Black, 2001).

Orsini, Francesca, The Hindi Public Sphere, 1920-1940: Language and Literature in the Age of Nationalism (New Delhi: Oxford University Press, 2002).

-- Print and Pleasure: Popular literature and entertaining fictions in colonial north India (Ranikhet: Permanent Black, 2010).

-- "How to do multilingual literary history? Lessons from fifteenth- and sixteenth-century north India." Indian Economic and Social History Review 49.2 (2012): 225-246.

Pellò, Stefano, Ṭūṭiyān-i Hind: Specchi identitari e proiezioni cosmopolite indo-persiane (1680-1856). (Firenze: Società Editrice Fiorentina, 2012).

Pinney, Thomas, Kipling's India: uncollected sketches 1884-88 (London: Macmillan, 1986).

Pollock, Sheldon, "The Cosmopolitan Vernacular." The Journal of Asian Studies 57.1 (1998): 6-37.

-- "India in the Vernacular Millennium: Literary Culture and Polity, 1000-1500." Daedalus 127.3 (1998): 41-74.

-- "Cosmopolitan and Vernacular in History." Public Culture 12.3 (2000): 591-625.

-- "Introduction: Working Papers on Sanskrit Knowledge-Systems on the eve of colonialism". Journal of Indian Philosophy 30 (2002): 431-439.

-- The Language of the Gods in the World of Men: Sanskrit, culture, and power in premodern India. (Berkeley: University of California Press, 2006).

Ricci, Ronit, Islam Translated: Literature, conversion, and the Arabic cosmopolis of South and Southeast Asia (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2011).

Schofield, Katherine Butler, "The Mughal Rasikas: Patrons – treatise writers – performers," Tellings and Texts: Music, Literature, and Performance cultures in North India, eds. F. Orsini and K. Schofield (Cambridge: Open Book Publishers [2015]).

Shih, Shu-Mei, "Global Literature and the Technologies of Recognition", World Literature: A Reader, eds. T. D'haen, C. Domínguez and M. Rosendahl Thomsen (London: Routledge, 2013), 259-74. (Originally published in PMLA 119.1 (2004): 16-30).

Soneji, Davesh, Unfinished Gestures: Devadāsīs, memory, and modernity in South India (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2012).

Stark, Ulrike, An Empire of Books: the Naval Kishore Press and the diffusion of the printed word in colonial India (Ranikhet: Permanent Black, 2007).

Vishwanatha, Gauri, Masks of Conquest: Literary studies and British rule in India (London: Faber, 2010).

Weidman, Amanda J., Singing the Classical, Voicing the Modern: the postcolonial politics of music in South India (Durham: Duke University Press, 2006).