

PALESTINE BEYOND NATIONAL FRAMES: EMERGING POLITICS, CULTURES, AND CLAIMS

Ruba Salih, SOAS University of London

Sophie Richter-Devroe, University of Exeter

Introduction

“We fought for dignity and freedom, not for territory or a national identity” were the words of Marek Edelman, one of the leaders of the 1943 Warsaw Ghetto uprising in his recollection of the events around the revolt. This was the first and most prominent action of armed urban resistance to the Germans during the second world war. Edelman was a member of the Bunds, a secular Jewish labour socialist movement, and an anti-Zionist who also later fought in the general Warsaw uprising of 1944 to liberate the city from the Nazis.

His memoir, The Ghetto Fights: Warsaw 1941-43 (1990), published first in 1945, was banned for decades in Israel where Edelman was considered persona non-grata. Not only did Edelman disrupt official Zionist historiography which claimed that the Warsaw ghetto resistance was led by Zionists - and the linear trajectory that pose these events as the natural prelude to the Zionist national movement in Palestine - Edelman also opposed Zionism as a conquering project that would have left unchallenged the plight of Jews in their homes in Europe. Edelman's reflections open a breach in the Israeli orthodox narrative by claiming that the protection of Jews and Judaism in their homes in Europe was at stake and this represented a divergent, and more radical and universalising, vision for Jews than an aggressive nationalism and occupation of another land.

Edelman's disrupting narratives offer inspiring material for an opening to this special issue on “Palestine beyond national frames”. Mainstream representations of the conflict between Israel and the Palestinians tend to portray it as a struggle between two opposing national aspirations on the same land. Yet, Zionism is not only an ethno-religious form of nationalism, but also an expansionist settler colonial project based on the ethnic cleansing of the native population. The Palestinian struggle for self-determination, on the other hand, is inscribed in an anti-colonial type of nationalism and liberation, closer to the ‘the fight for dignity and freedom’ that Edelman recalls as the core call of the Warsaw Ghetto resistance.

Unsurprisingly, colonisation, dispossession and statelessness meant that the ‘national’ has featured as the prime lexicon for speaking of Palestine. The ‘national’ has functioned as the affective and symbolic frame for the political project of liberation for Palestinians, and has been also the underlying grid of most of the scholarly work on Palestine.

However, in this issue we explore the view that going beyond national frames can disclose a different dimension of the Palestinian politics of liberation. We shed light on an indigenous population engaged in ongoing and everyday collective resistance to protect their “home” and defend their “land” - as they are constantly reconfigured and imagined across place and time - rather than a memorialised homeland or national territory. Furthermore, over time, Palestine, as a ‘site’ -or laboratory- of encroached forms of control, surveillance, dispossession, and separation, has become a paradigm for universal claims to justice across the world, shifting its scope from a national to an international public (see, among others, Collins 2012 and Salih, Welchman and Zambelli 2017).

Thinking beyond national frames

Writing at the time of the First Intifada in 1989, Ted Swedenburg (1989) reflected on the ineluctability of the national: studying the Great Revolt of 1936-39 he showed how national frames functioned to couch or even silence subaltern class memories of the Revolt (see also Swedenburg 1995); they seemed inescapable as political, affective and ideological lenses carving the oral histories of his Palestinian interlocutors. Not surprisingly, the elderly he interviewed prioritised Palestinian unity and hesitated to reveal the scissions and cleavages in their memories and narratives of the Revolt. Swedenburg concluded that “[b]ecause Israeli policies concentrate so ferociously on disintegrating all cultural forms that evoke the national reality, Palestinians carefully protect the memory of those same symbols.” (1989: 268).

When the research community is subject to systematic repression as a national group, what moral and political positions are available to the researcher? Swedenburg felt “compelled to participate in those veils and to resist a full revelation before the holders of power” assigning himself the duty to produce a “socially acceptable” narrative within which the Palestinian case might be argued in the West, which like all narratives, “will necessarily be based on partial truths and strategic exclusions” (ibid: 270).¹

Swedenburg wrote his reflections at a moment when Palestinian nationalism and the national project itself were going through significant moves towards a clear nation-statist form. From the early 1980s onwards, PLO chairman Arafat started to signal his readiness to participate in negotiations with Israel and work, in line with UN Resolution 242, on a territorial solution to the conflict (Ghanem 2013: 22-23). With the 1988 Declaration of Independence at the 19th session of the Palestinian National Council in Algiers the slogan “two states for two people” gained prominence, and a distinctly nation-statist project became the hegemonic articulation of Palestinian nationalism, marginalising other imaginaries and imaginings, whether anchored to trans- or subnational frames. National liberation took predominantly the shape of territorial liberation in a two-state solution.

Three decades since the beginning of the nation-state project, which took concrete form after the signing of the Oslo agreement in 1993, we feel compelled in this issue to interrogate the “national” from its margins and borders. This probing exercise feels particularly relevant at a time when the fallacies of the Palestinian nation-state-building project - with its unique positioning, simultaneously across colonial, post-colonial and neo-colonial temporalities economies, sovereignties - are emerging in all their dramatic dimensions. Neo-liberal discourse and technologies shaped by donors’ notion of a ‘liberal peace’, coupled with a politically sieged, limited, sovereignty based on security, and the persistence of colonial violence dramatically shoved off the democratic promise from the state-building process (Haddad 2016).

Awareness of the pitfalls of the concrete manifestation of the national project in Palestine today leads us to recognize that such project may carry fissures also at an ideational level. In this introduction we therefore ask how ‘national frames’, as an analytical category and a lens of investigation, have shaped the literature on Palestine, its scope, questions and foci of enquiry and how these have been challenged.

¹ See also the exchange between Ted Swedenburg (1992) and Moshe Shokeid (1992) that followed the publication of Swedenburg’s (1989) original article on the topic.

Going beyond national frames is a political as well as an epistemic project. Dabashi (2016) has convincingly shown (with reference to Iran, but also more widely to the Arab and post-colonial world) that the nation-state formation can never be entirely freed from its linkages to colonialism or, to say it with Chatterjee, “the modern regime of power” (Chatterjee 1993: xx; see also Abu Lughod 1996, Mbembe 2001). To liberate the nation “from the false epistemic and political foregrounding of ethnic nationalism, sectarian provincialism, and thus to restore the cosmopolitan worldliness out of which these nations were formed in the first place” (Dabashi, 2016: kindle location 383-386) would require a process of “remapping [...] the world beyond its colonial contortions” (ibid: kindle location 3275-3287; see also Dabashi 2012). For Dabashi, stateless nations could be one of the epistemic starting points for thinking outside nation-statist frames:

it is today imperative to retrieve and rearticulate the regional, and in fact global, consequences of a creative defiance of all the current frontier fictions that hold the fate of peoples imprisoned within frames of reference that confine and control their liberation movements. From Palestinians to Kurds, Baluchis, Azaris, and so on, people who have been historically denied their national formations can in fact overcome and dismantle the frontier fictions that have foreclosed their future, and offer alternative modalities of postnational solidarity and alliance. (2016: kindle location 464-472)

Here we propose Palestine as a paradigm to think of liberation beyond the not yet fully realized and yet already mutilated project of the state. Inspired by Johnson and Shehadeh’s intimate and provocative collection of essays around Palestine as beginning rather than origin, fruit of the political work of imagination of what could be, beyond the static memory of what never was, (Johnson and Shehadeh 2013), we explore what do liberation and political subjectivity look like for those currently excluded or marginalised from the emotive project of a semi-sovereign nation-state as a “truncated and transitory” Authority. (Johnson and Shehadeh 2013).

We wish to give space in this special issue to hazardous and yet radical and wider-embracing scenarios stemming from Palestine’s political work as it unfolds through class, indigeneity, intersectionality, diaspora, borders and exile. More specifically, how might refugees, exiled and displaced, i.e. those centrally imbricated in, but benefitting little from, the current hegemonic national project challenge its central logics and/or break free of its fallacies?

A critical engagement with methodological nationalism has been pioneered, in particular, in diaspora and transnationalism studies. This literature stressed the multiple networks, flows, mobilities and interactions that link people, institutions, goods and ideas across the borders of nation-states (see, among others, Glick-Schiller, Basch, Blanc 1992; Sassen 1998; Appadurai 1991; Malkki 1992). Arguing that “decentered, lateral connections may be as important as those formed around a teleology of origin/return”, Clifford called for a shift in focus from exclusivist and sedentarist notions of roots in national territories to “a shared, ongoing history of displacement, suffering, adaptation, or resistance” which, he contends “may be as important as the projection of a specific origin” (1994: 306).

Along similar lines, Lisa Malkki argued that “there has emerged a new awareness of the global social fact that, now more than perhaps ever before, people are chronically mobile and routinely displaced, and invent homes and homelands in the absence of territorial, national bases-not in situ, but through memories of, and claims on, places that they can or will no longer corporeally inhabit.” (1992: 24). Malkki’s work is particularly inspirational in that it questions the sedentarist and “arborescent metaphors” of roots and rootedness not for culturally hybrid diasporic or hyphenated peoples, but for refugee populations who were forced by violent events to leave their original homes.

Unsurprisingly, the methodological and epistemological provocations emerging from rethinking the dynamics between “roots and routes” (Clifford, 1997) have only sporadically and hesitantly been taken up in the academic work on Palestine. Rabinowitz’ (2000, 2001) studies of Palestinians in Israel as a “trapped minority” might be an exception. For him “[a] nonseparative imagination of the territory of Palestine/Israel will have to move away from the state and the nation as the only unit of analysis and the only idiom of affiliation” (2000: 768). Rabinowitz’ call for rethinking the relationships between place and identity beyond national frames certainly opens up creative ways to think about Palestine and Israel by challenging “the self-congratulatory territorializing narration of the nation” (ibid 770). Swedenburg and Stein endorsed further the scrutiny of methodological nationalism in the introduction to their volume on the politics of popular culture where they critiqued Palestine studies for remaining caught within “the national paradigm, [that is] a scholarly narrative that installs the national or nation-state as the inherent logic guiding the critical analysis” (2005: 5).

Yet, for most Palestinians the nation-state project, built on the nexus of territory, nation and state, is hard to overcome as an emotive project of liberation. This is even more so, as the colonization of Palestinians' land takes on more violent and pervasive qualities, where not only space and place but, as Julie Peteet compellingly shows in her contribution to this special issue, also time is occupied. As Peteet elaborated earlier, even if the orientation to Palestine has over the years become a complex field of inchoate concrete and imagined relations, and took the shape of "mediated and unmediated" metaphorical and affective - along with territorial-connections, the "[t]erritory of origin, particularly when it has been claimed and occupied by another, remains critical to nationalist imaginings and a sense of justice" (Peteet 2007: 637). From this angle, Clifford's (1994) emphasis on "lateral connections" not only risks diverting or even undermining the Palestinians' rights to land, but might even serve as a tool of normalization of Palestinian dispossession.

While acknowledging that this endeavor is not without its risks, we contend that the question of whether and how the right to land, to self-determination and to exist might feature in a more radical vision for justice than that embodied by the neo-colonial and neo-liberal consensus of the Palestinian "nation-state" is central and critical. In this sense, we feel the urge to go beyond understandably defensive nationalist stances by making visible the multiple ways in which Palestinians think, become subjects, act, or mobilize through visions and political practices outside of - but not necessarily oppositional to - national frames. Yet, rather than uncritically celebrating painless and free-floating notion of diasporic identities, we acknowledge the fragmentation and de-territorialisation of Palestinian nation-hood, stimulated by Edward Said's early elaboration on Palestine as "exile" (2002, see also Johnson and Shehadeh 2013). We therefore proceed by probing the applicability of borders, exilic and diasporic subjectivities -and their specific politics- as fertile grounds for political subject-formation and liberation beyond the nation-state.

Although historically situated across a multiplicity of references, regional, pan-Arab, local and religious among others (see e.g. Khalidi 1997; Doumani 1995; Tamari 2008 and also Allen this volume), contemporary Palestinian identity remains trapped in the grammar of the 'national'. Yet, given that Palestinian political subjectivities are formed in a context of statelessness (or failed state-building) it remains important to ask whether, and in which specific ways, are Palestinian political subjecthoods, visions, struggles and vocabularies linked, but not limited to this national grammar?

Our enquiries are strongly stimulated by the work of postcolonial, subaltern and feminist theorists. Judith Butler cogently (Butler and Athanasiou 2013:9) draws attention to how liberal notions of possessive individualism often translate into possessive nationalism. Land confiscation, annexation, and fragmentation are foundational not only to the formation of Israeli settler-nationalism but also to the definition of its citizens as political and human subjects. In this line, we consider urgent to ask not only how can claims to land simultaneously work to decolonize “the apparatus of propertied human subjectivity?” (Butler and Athanasiou, 2013:27) but also to enquire which categories of the human are formed against the background of the abject and the dispossessed? “How has the human been formed and maintained on the condition of set of dispossessions? (Butler and Athanasiou, 2013:36, see also Peteet and Salih in this issue)

Anti-colonial nationalism, on the other hand, as Chatterjee (1993) claimed in his critique to Benedict Anderson (1983) should not simply be read through and subsumed under the normative history of nationalism and nation-state building processes of the West. Chatterjee made the important distinction between the “material” and “spiritual” domain of nationalism, arguing that in the material domain - that of state, economy, technology, etc - “the West had proved its superiority and the East had succumbed”. Yet, in the spiritual domain, i.e. that of cultural identity, post-colonial subjects retained a certain “freedom of imagination” (1993: 6-7). He coined the notion “political society” to denote those new aspirations and claims that in many postcolonial contexts emerged outside, and somehow in opposition to, the earlier liberal consensus of state-civil society relations. He argued that “the historical task that has been set by these movements is to work out new forms of democratic institutions and practices in the mediating field of political society that lies between civil society and the nation-state” (Chatterjee, 1998: 63). “Political societies”, as Chatterjee analyses them, are invested in a project of democracy rather than one of nationalism and modernization, from which they were excluded or only partially included. While their idioms are still national, these movements may encompass, express and long for different types of allegiances, aspirations, claims, and solidarities beyond the nation-state, which comes to be scrutinized, contested and even challenged.

We draw from Chatterjee's insights to revert the peripheral space given to exile, displacement and refugeehood within national frames, particularly in the current configuration of sovereignty in Palestine and in the post-colonial Arab nation-states at large, where refugees and/as stateless are often seen as superfluous humanities, suspended in a non-political space, merely awaiting return to a memorialized past and roots. If analyzed outside the teleological box of national frames, refugees and displaced - with their aspirations to return but also to social justice and full rights in their places of exile - could be seen as "political societies" pushing forward a claim for radical democracy rather than merely a nationalist project (Salih, 2014, Salih and Richter-Devroe, forthcoming).

Early Palestinian Nationalism: Relational Histories

Given the scope of this introduction, we provide here only a cursory sketch of the literature on Palestinian nationalism and nation-state building. Our focus remains on how 'the national' has functioned as lens, but also as blinker, in studying and forming Palestinian identities and political struggles.

The project of nation-state building, and thus the nation-state and nationalism, has featured centrally in Arab historiography and modernist thinking (see, among others, Choueiri 2000, Khalidi 1991). Palestine, in this regard, is no exception, although it has its own specificities.

Khalidi's seminal work has countered Zionist historiography's claims that Palestinian national identity emerged only in response to Israeli nationalism by showing how Palestinian identity, characterised by multiple affiliations and loyalties, pre-existed the establishment of Israel (1997: 63-88; see also Kimmerling and Migdal 1993: 68-69). Doumani follows a similar line of argument, stressing that the "economic, social, and cultural relations between the inhabitants of the various regions of Palestine during the Ottoman period [are crucial in explaining] why Palestine became a nation in the minds of the people who call themselves Palestinians today" (Doumani 1995: 245, see also Nassar 2002: 29-30). Swedenburg's (1995) study, furthermore, stressed the important role that peasant resistance played in the Arab Revolt, and thus also in the formation of modern Palestinian identity.² Moving from local to regional identities, Tamari (2009) cogently showed in his brilliant study that Palestine was and continues to be part of a much larger social formation, adding that Palestine's cultural and political environment is crucially defined by its belonging to the wider environment of the Arab East, from which it was forcibly detached in 1917 (2009). Yet, these wider dimensions of Palestinian political cultures and identities have been sidelined in what Doumani aptly termed the "nationalist re-writing of history" (Doumani 1999: 17).

Despite these convincing claims that, one, Palestinian communal identity emerged before Zionist colonisation of Palestine and, two, continues until today to be made up of multiple identities below and beyond the national, there is little disagreement on the fact that the 1948 Nakba and the Palestinian exodus functioned as a watershed in the formation of Palestinian national consciousness, providing the "context for the transformation of the old Palestinian local and communal affiliations into nationalist ones." (Nassar 2002: 34). But rather than emerging from the encounter with the Zionist national movement per se, as often claimed in Israeli historiography, the Nakba left its mark on Palestinian national identity formation in various and multiple ways. Most importantly, as Nassar (ibid 35) argues, "[t]he notion of a Palestinian collective identity which started among the refugees and dominated modern Palestinian national discourse was essentially based on the experience of the refugee camps." This meant that exile and refugee status – rather than the neat and classic overlapping between nation, state and territory – came to be and still is core to the specificity of modern Palestinian national identity. Moreover, the events of 1948 also show that the Palestinian national project and identity were shaped in close relation and interaction with other national formations, both Arab and Zionist. First, given the large exodus, Palestinian national identity was formed in exile in interaction with host country politics and their own national identity formation processes. The branding of Palestinians as 'other' in surrounding Arab nation-states-in-the-making (see e.g. Massad 2001) was crucial not only in the formation of Arab host country's own national imaginings, but also in the shaping of the Palestinian national identity. (Nassar 2002: 27).

² Interestingly the focus on urban identities (Khalidi 1997; Doumani 1995) marginalizes non-urban Palestinian communities in the formation of Palestinian national identity. While Swedenburg's (1995) study highlight the role of peasants in Arab revolt, the Bedouin communities of the South remain the most ignored in Palestinian historiography.

For some, inter-Arab politics, in particular Arab states' policies towards Palestine and the failure of the Arab nationalist movement, proved foundational in the creation of Palestinian national identity, more so than Zionism (e.g. Muslih 1988: 87). Yet, although Palestinian national identity was formed vis-à-vis other nationalisms (and vice versa), this did not mean, that in specific historical moments other supra-national identifications also (re-)surfaced. For example, pan-Arab political discourse of the 1950s and 60s negotiated and manoeuvred between Palestinians' belonging to broader Arab identity and political entity, on the one hand, and a specific Palestinian particularity and national quest, on the other – a dynamic that Lori Allen sheds more light on in her contribution to this volume. The Arab Nationalist Movement under Habash and Hawatmeh, for example, called for the liberation of Palestine through the pan-Arabist language of Arab nationalism (see e.g. Pearlman 2011: 62-93).

For Sayigh there remained a tension between the Palestinian national movement and its pan-Arab allegiances: “it was the Arab States that set the Palestinian agenda, invariably according to their own interests, perceptions and priorities. Yet, Arab support for the establishment of the Palestinians in 1974 effectively implied abdication of practical responsibility for the attainment of its national objectives.” (1997: 21). Palestinian national goals thus were always linked to, and, in Sayigh's evaluation held back by, the policies of surrounding Arab states. This highlights that Palestinian and other Arab nationalism always shaped each other, rather than existing as separate entities.

Zachary Lockman, has found such a dialectical relationship also between Zionism and Palestinian nationalism. He stressed the need to trace the relations, influences and co-constitutions between what gets to be represented as bounded and cohesive national communities, and critiqued both Zionist and nationalist separatist approaches for bringing about what he calls the dual society model. Such an approach, he argued, rendered the “mutually constitutive impact [of the two societies] virtually invisible”, and curtailed the vision of how “boundaries between (and within) communities were drawn and re-produced, and practices of separation, exclusion, and conflict articulated” (1993: 104). Proposing a “relational history”, Lockman (1996: 8) highlights that we need to trace the “mutually formative interactions” (ibid 9) between Palestinian and Israeli communities and identities, as well as between the Zionism and Palestinian nationalism before and after 1948.

Highlighting these interdependencies between Palestinian nationalism and the surrounding Arab states on the one hand and Zionism on the other, however, should not lead to an uncritical denial of power asymmetries. Monterescu (2007), in his study on Jaffa, argues that urban spaces in “mixed towns” like Jaffa are in fact intertwined and, when “[a]nalyzed relationally, these spaces produce peculiar forms of quotidian social relations between Palestinians and Israelis, producing counter-hegemonic local identities that challenge both Palestinian and Jewish nationalisms.” (ibid: 174) Yet, Monterescu stresses: “the two groups and their identities were constituted in a series of dialectic oppositions and homologies which not only opposed each other, but at the same time dialectically created each other, in dynamic but constantly asymmetrical relations of power” (ibid: 175, emphasis added).

In sum, while post-1967 scholarly work on Palestine has moved towards acknowledging interdependencies between national formations, the challenge remains how to recognize relational forces at work, while keeping wary of the risks of normalising dispossession or subsuming the history of Palestinians within the colonizers’ or the Arab states’ history and framework (Abu Lughod quoted in Lockman 1993: 606).

The Oslo Accords and the Crisis of the “National”

The 1993 Oslo Accords and the subsequent period of ‘state- and peace-building’ provoked a deep crisis to the Palestinian national project, both in its material and spiritual dimensions. Oslo, was born with a paradoxical agenda of state-building under settler-colonial occupation. It established the PNA as the state-in-the-making without sovereignty which, nevertheless, got tasked with negotiating peace with the ‘other’ side, building a foreign-funded and aid-dependent state machinery on the reduced and dismembered territory of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, and representing only a fragment of the Palestinian nation.

Delineating the West Bank and Gaza Strip as the territorial base for a future nation-state, Oslo excluded all those Palestinians who do not reside in these areas. As such, the Accords effectively established a new legal marker to define who is and who is not Palestinian (under PA sovereignty) with drastic consequences for many: “Those who lived the catastrophe are now facing a new catastrophe: the legal disappearance of their Palestinian identity, an identity that evolved from their personal diasporic experience in the years between the creation of Israel and today” (Nassar 2002: 35-6). With the Oslo Accords the PNA thus not only sidelined the PLO, the refugees (as well as Palestinians in Israel), and their demands, but also further fragmented the Palestinian community, leaving those not under their mandate in limbo as to who could represent and claim their rights.

Studies on pre-Oslo Palestine had already drawn attention to some of the tensions between gender and nationalist agendas, which pre-existed the phase of failed state-and peace-building. Gendered analyses of the First Intifada, for example, with their sensitivities to the loci and qualities of power and resistance also made manifest some of the homogenizing and repressive elements within Palestinian nationalism. Many of these studies were stimulated by feminist and post-colonial theories highlighting the gendered ambiguities and fallacies of colonial and post-colonial formations, and tracing how women became major pawns, but also agents, in the internal power plays of the national movement (Kuttab 1993; Abdo 1994; Jad 1995; Sabbagh 1998).

Hammami’s (1990) study on the “hijab campaign” during the First Intifada, in this regard, not only showed how gendered politics of control were used by secular and religious political actors, but also how discourses on women’s dress and modesty were deployed to measure national commitment. It is not incidental that these tendencies were more poignantly unveiled during the uprising. The First Intifada, although commonly represented as a national uprising, also incorporated, articulated and enacted its struggle for social justice beyond national frames, and along the lines of class (Hiltermann 1993; Pearlman 2011) and gender (Kuttab 1993; Hasso 2001, 2005).

The wider turn to the paradigm of the everyday and everyday resistance (de Certeau 1984; Scott, 1985) within anthropology and sociology also prompted a new gaze on the national (e.g. Kelly 2008; van Teefelen 2007; Allen 2008; Hammami 2004). Rather than viewing the everyday as opposed to the national, these studies called for the need to trace the shapes that the national takes in the context of daily life and how everyday acts are part and parcel of constructing national subjects. The question thus turns from whether to how the everyday is nationalised, and what meanings ‘the national’ takes in these transformations (Shalhoub-Kevorkian 2009; Richter-Devroe 2011).

Within the field of history and oral history, a turning point was represented by Ilan Pappé’s collection (2007) “The Palestine/Israel Question”, which produced a social history from below. Not incidentally, this focus had gained wider currency after the Oslo accords, with oral historians, both in academic and community circles, striving to ‘decolonise methodology’ (Gluck, 2008), but also to scrutinize more broadly issues of memory, memorialization and the question of who gets to speak, write and produce history on “Palestine”.³ Some oral history studies focused especially on Palestinian women’s narratives,⁴ capturing women’s subjective, experience-based and local knowledges of history, place and identity (Richter-Devroe, 2017), as well as their different patterns of narrative style and forms of self-representation (Sayigh, 1998, 2007a &b). This work was interested in uncovering other lines of belonging, affiliations and solidarities, and, as such, provided a basis for a historical analysis that went, whether implicitly or more explicitly, beyond classic national lines (see also Salih, 2017).

Yet, a close focus on how people remember, narrate and frame their pasts, also highlighted once more that the “national” remains a crucial foregrounding language in Palestine, even when memory and imagination merge producing Palestine as beginning rather than as origin (Johnson and Shehadeh 2013). Rochelle Davis’ study of Palestinian village books (2005), for example, traces how refugees used the histories of their local villages as a platform to counter and problematize their progressive abandonment by, firstly, the PLO from the mid-1980s onwards and, later decisively, the PA with the Oslo Accords. As the fissures between refugees and the national leadership deepened, refugees’ village histories became more institutionalised, but also nationalised. In this process, they functioned as an alternative, rather than in opposition to, national frames, with the national becoming a space of competing narratives and visions. In a similar vein, Diana Allen (2007) has noted that memories and narratives of the Nakba have become increasingly institutionalised and integrated into the Palestinian nationalist discourse (see also Sayigh 2002). The fact that the PA certainly has lost its credibility as the national representative of the Palestinian people, particularly among refugees, therefore does not mean that the national as a horizon for liberation has lost its grip on people's political identities, projects and imaginaries. Rather, as a contested semantic and political field, it might take different forms and shapes.

³ Studies focused especially on the Nakba (see among others, Abu-Lughod and Sa’di, eds. (2007), Kabha, ed. (2006) and Masalha, ed. (2005), but also on other aspects of, and events in, Palestinian history (Swedenburg 2003; Slymovics 1998).

⁴ Oral history studies with a focus on Palestinian women include Gluck (2008), Khalili and Humphries (2007), Fleischmann (2003), Kassem (2011), Sayigh (1998, 2002, 2007a&b). Of course, anthropologists also use similar methods to document history (e.g. Peteet 1991).

Settler-colonialism, the national and 'border thinking'

The failure of the Oslo "peace process" to provide national liberation propelled a further conceptual paradigm within Palestine studies. Perhaps the most important shift is the emergence of the settler colonial paradigm and, relatedly, of indigeneity.⁵ Differently from other forms of colonial rule, which tend to control the indigenous population through racialised labour exploitation, settler colonialism is based on a "logic of elimination of the native" (Wolfe 2006: 387)

How does adopting a settler-colonial paradigm to studying Palestinian struggles for liberation push us to think beyond national frames?⁶ Veracini (2013) suggests that colonialism and settler-colonialism are decidedly different: while the former operates control over land and natives from a centre of authority and needs for its success to maintain the rule of colonial difference between colonisers and colonised, the latter's success is measured against its ability to normalise the settlers as indigenous to the land. If national emancipation, in the form of an emancipated sovereignty, is the historical foreseen outcome of anti-colonial struggles seeking to end colonial domination, liberation from settler colonialism requires frameworks other than the national one.

Importantly, indigeneity, as a political subjectivity, claim and project that resists settler colonialism, is not about a mere, unmediated 'return' to fixed roots. Clifford argued that indigeneity is "a process of becoming" in which people "reach back selectively to deeply rooted, adaptive traditions: creating new pathways in a complex postmodernity” (2013: 7). Indigeneity in the Palestinian context is historically, socially and politically constructed in response to settler colonialism which must be understood as a structure not an event (Wolfe 2006). The ongoing struggles by the native population to de-normalise and undo this settler-colonial structure, which aims to realise the settlers’ claims to the land, thus cannot be read through the lens of identity politics. Like elsewhere Palestinian indigeneity does not endorse fixed and essentialised notions of identity, memory and belonging, but is rather born out of the sites and processes of struggles that Palestinians in different locations and times are and have been inhabiting.⁷ Although constantly shifting, these positionalities never were comfortably situated in a fully-fledged and established nation-state, nor was the nation-statist agenda the only frame that Palestinians followed when struggling for liberation from settler colonialism.

⁵ For studies on indigeneity more broadly, see Povinelli (2002) as well as the contributions in Ivison, Patton and Sanders, eds. (2000) and in Simpson, ed. (2014).

⁶ Among the scholars who have adopted the settler colonial paradigm for Palestine are Falah (2005), Pappé (2012), Piterberg (2008), Shafir (1996), Yiftachel (2006), Veracini (2010, 2013), Wolfe (1999, 2006) and Salamanca et al. (2012).

In this issue we approach “the national” through and from the lens of its multiple and constantly remade borders and margins that penetrate deep in and extend far beyond the national territory, the latter also contingently defined and imagined. For Palestinians, borders are not only constantly shifting due to an ever-expanding territorial colonisation pushing further and deeper in their land, but there are also the erased and redrawn boundaries of their state-in-the-making.

We start from the positionalities of those marginalised by, or on the margins of, national formations – those who, in Mignolo’s terms, dwell in the border, not the territory (2000: xv): how might national and nation-statist hegemonic frames, both in their material and ideational manifestations, be challenged by those not firmly established within the “national order of things” (Malkki, 1992)? What does “border thinking” (Mignolo 2010) add to the understanding of contemporary manifestations of power, forms of dispossession and struggles in Palestine? Does it shed light on new hierarchies and claims cutting through and across the national?

All contributions in this special issue engage with dimensions of Palestinian existence and struggle beyond classic national frames. They study refugees collective catharsis from national frames (Salih), international solidarity campaigns (Allen), indigenous and class struggles (Pappe and Allan), as well as the affective (Gabiam), spatial (Parizot) and temporal (Peteeet) dimensions of dwelling in or moving across borders or separation walls. While displaying different outlooks on what going beyond national frames might lead to, they all share the vision that Palestine can be a particularly potent paradigm to imagine liberation and justice within and without the “national territory”.

⁷ See the edited volume by Johnson and Shehadeh (2013) in which contributors reflect on how Palestinians live and imagine home and exile. The contributions demonstrate vividly and creatively how Palestine and Palestinianness always is perceived through and lived as a dynamic process of becoming, rather than fixed static identity politics.

If, as Mignolo auspicates, “border thinking” constitutes a first and essential step towards decolonisation, what Dabashi (2016) calls a “liberation geography” (see also Lubin 2014, Pagès-El Karoui 2012), we hope that by tracing and bringing to light the largely hidden non-national formations and articulations that Palestinians imagine and live on a daily basis, the articles in this issue not only reveal something about the national, but also contribute to the epistemic and political project of decolonising Palestine.

References

Abdo, Nahla. 1994. “Nationalism and Feminism: Palestinian Women and the Intifada - No Going back?.” In Gender and National Identity, edited by Valentine Moghadam, 148-168. London: Zed Books.

Appadurai, Arjun. 1991. “Global Ethnoscapes: Notes and Queries for a Transnational Anthropology.” In Recapturing Anthropology, edited by Richard Fox, 191-210. Santa Fe, NM: School for American Research Press.

Allen, Lori. 2008. “Getting by the Occupation: How Violence Became Normal during the Second Palestinian Intifada.” Cultural Anthropology 23: 453–87.

Allan, Diana K. 2007. “The Politics of Witness: Remembering and Forgetting 1948 in Shatila Camp.” In Nakba: Palestine, 1948 and the Claims of Memory, edited by Ahmad A. Sa'adi and Lila Abu-Lughod. New York: Columbia University Press.

Anderson, Benedict. 1983. Imagined communities: reflections on the origin and spread of nationalism. London: Verso.

Butler, Judith and Athena Athanasiou. 2013 Dispossession: The Performative in the Political. University of California Press.

Chatterjee, Partha. 1993. The Nation and Its Fragments: Colonial and Postcolonial Histories. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Chatterjee, Partha 2003 Politics of the Governed: Considerations on Political Society in Most of the World, Columbia University Press, New York, 2004

Choueri, Yousif 2000. Arab Nationalism: A History: Nation and State in the Arab World. Wiley Blackwell.

Clifford, James 1994. "Diasporas" Cultural Anthropology, Vol. 9, No. 3, Further Inflections: Toward Ethnographies of the Future, pp. 302-338.

Clifford, James. 1997. Routes: Travel and Translation in the Late Twentieth Century. Harvard University Press.

Clifford, James. 2013. Returns: Becoming Indigenous in the Twenty-First Century. Massachusetts: Harvard University Press.

Collins, John. 2012. Global Palestine. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Dabashi, Hamid 2012, The Arab Spring: The End of Postcolonialism, London: Zed Books.

Dabashi, Hamid. 2016. Iran Without Borders: Towards a Critique of the Postcolonial Nation. New York: Verso Books.

Davis, Rochelle A. 2010. Palestinian Village Histories: Geographies of the Displaced. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.

de Certeau, Michel. 1984. The Practice of Everyday Life. Translated by Steven Rendall. Berkeley: University of California Press

Doumani, Beshara. 1995. Rediscovering Palestine: Merchants and Peasants in Jabal Nablus, 1700-1900. Berkeley, California: University of California Press.

Edelman, Marek. 1990. The Ghetto Fights: Warsaw 1941-43, Bookmarks.

Falah, Ghazi-Walid. 2005. "The geopolitics of 'Enclavisation' and the demise of a two-state Solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict." Third World Quarterly 26, no. 8: 1341-1372.

Fleischmann, Ellen. 2003. The Nation and Its "New" Women: The Palestinian Women's Movement, 1920-1948. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Ghanem, As'ad. 2013. "Palestinian Nationalism: An Overview." Israel Studies 18, no. 2: 11-29. <http://www.jstor.org/stable/10.2979/israelstudies.18.2.11>

Gluck, Sherna Beger. 2008. "Oral History and al-Nakbah." Oral History Review 35, no.1: 68-80.

Haddad, Toufiq 2016 Palestine Ltd: Neoliberalism and Nationalism in the Occupied Territory. I.B. Taurus.

Hasso, Frances Susan. 2001. "Feminist Generations? The Long-Term Impact of Social Movement Involvement on Palestinian Women's Lives." American Journal of Sociology 107, no. 3: 586-611.

Hasso, Frances Susan. 2005. Resistance, Repression, and Gender Politics in Occupied Palestine and Jordan. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press.

Hammami, Rema. 2004. "Gender, Nakba and Nation: Palestinian Women's Presence and Absence in the Narration of 1948 Memories". Birzeit Review of Women's Studies, Vol. 2.

Hammami, Rema. 1990. "Women, the Hijab and the Intifada." Middle East Report, no. 164/165: 24-28+71+78.

Hiltermann, Joost R. 1993. Behind the Intifada: Labor and Women's Movements in the Occupied Territories. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Jad, Islah. 1995. "Claiming Feminism, Claiming Nationalism: Women's Movement." In The Challenges of Local Feminisms, edited by Amrita Basu, 226-48. Boulder: Westview Press.

Jean-Klein, Iris. 2001. "Nationalism and Resistance: The Two Faces of Everyday Activism in Palestine during the Intifada." Cultural Anthropology 16, no. 1: 83-126.

Johnson, Penny and Raha Shehadeh. eds. 2013 Seeking Palestine: New Palestinian Writing on Exile and Home. Olive Branch Press

Kabha, M., ed. (2006) Towards a Historical Narrative of the Nakba: Complexities and Challenges, Haifa: Mada - Arab Center for Applied Social Research (in Arabic).

Kassem, Fatma. 2011. Palestinian Women: Narrative histories and gendered memory. London: Zed Books.

Kelly, Tobias. 2008. "The attractions of accountancy: Living an ordinary life during the second Palestinian intifada." Ethnography 9, no. 3: 351-76.

Khalidi, Rashid. 1991. "Arab Nationalism: Historical Problems in the Literature." The American Historical Review 96, no. 5:1363-1373 <http://www.jstor.org/stable/2165275>

Khalidi, Rashid. 1997. Palestinian Identity: The Construction of Modern National Consciousness. New York: Columbia University Press.

Khalili, Laleh, and Isabelle Humphries. 2007. "The Gender of Nakba Memory." In Nakba: Palestine, 1948 and the Claims of Memory, edited by Ahmad H. Sa'adi and Lila Abu-Lughod, 207-228. New York: Columbia University Press.

Kimmerling, Baruch and Joel S. Migdal. 1993. Palestinians: The Making of a People. New York: Free Press.

Kuttab, Eileen S. 1993. "Palestinian Women in the Intifada: Fighting on Two Fronts." Arab Studies Quarterly 15, no. 2: 69–85.

Lubin, Alex. 2014. Geographies of Liberation: The Making of an Afro-Arab Political Imaginary. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

Lockman, Zachary. 1993. "Railway Workers and Relational History: Arabs and Jews in British-Ruled Palestine." Comparative Studies in Society and History 35, no. 3: 601-627.

Lockman, Zachary. 1996. Comrades and Enemies: Arab and Jewish Workers in Palestine 1906–1948, 1-16. Berkeley: University of California.

Masalha, Nur. 2005. Catastrophe Remembered: Palestine, Israel and the Internal Refugees, London: Zed Books.

Malkki, Liisa. 1992. "National Geographic: The Rooting of Peoples and the Territorialization of National Identity among Scholars and Refugees." Cultural Anthropology 7, no. 1: 24-44.

Mbembe, Achille. 2001. Postcolony, University of California Press, Berkeley.

Muhammad Muslih. 1988. The Origins of Palestinian Nationalism. New York: Columbia University Press.

Mignolo, Walter D. 2010. Local histories/global designs: Coloniality, subaltern knowledges, and border thinking. New Jersey: Princeton University Press.

Monterescu, Daniel. 2007 "Heteronomy: The Cultural Logic of Urban Space and Sociality in Jaffa." In Mixed towns, trapped communities: historical narratives, spatial dynamics, gender relations and cultural encounters in Palestinian-Israeli towns, edited by Daniel Monterescu and Dan Rabinowitz, 157- 176. New York: Routledge.

Nassar, Issam. 2002 "Reflections on Writing the History of Palestinian Identity." Palestine-Israel Journal, Vol. 8 No 4, 2001 and Vol. 9 No 1. <http://www.pij.org/details.php?id=791>

Pagès-El Karoui Delphine. 2012. "Geography of Social Change in Egypt". EchoGéo Issue 21, 2012, Retrieved from: <http://echogeo.revues.org/13204>.

Pappe, Ilan. ed. 2007. The Israel/Palestine Question: A Reader (Rewriting Histories). London: Routledge

Pearlman, Wendy. 2011. Violence, Nonviolence and the Palestinian National Movement. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Peteet, Julie. 1991. Gender in Crisis: Women and the Palestinian Resistance Movement. Columbia University Press.

Peteet, Julie. 2007. "Problematizing a Palestinians Diaspora." International Journal of Middle East Studies 39, no. 04: 627-646.

Piterberg, Gabriel. 2008. The returns of Zionism: Myths, politics and scholarship in Israel. London: Verso.

Povinelli, Elizabeth. 2002. The Cunning of Recognition: Indigenous Alterities and the Making of Australian Multiculturalism. Durham: Duke University Press.

Rabinowitz, Dan. 2000. "Postnational Palestine/Israel? Globalization, Diaspora, Transnationalism, and the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict." Critical Inquiry 26, no. 4: 757-772. <http://www.jstor.org/stable/1344329>.

Rabinowitz, Dan. 2001. "The Palestinian citizens of Israel, the concept of trapped minority and the discourse of transnationalism in anthropology." Ethnic and Racial Studies 24, no. 1: 64–85.

Richter-Devroe, Sophie. 2011. "Palestinian Women's Everyday Resistance: Between Normality and Normalization." Journal of International Women's Studies 12: 32–46.

Richter-Devroe, Sophie 2017. "Biography, Life History and Orality: A Naqab Bedouin Woman's Narrative of Displacement, Expulsion and Escape in Historic Southern Palestine, 1930-1970", HAWWA, Vol. 14, No. 3, pp. 310–341.

Sa'di, Ahmad and Lila Abu-Lughod, ed. 2007. Nakba: Palestine, 1948 and the Claims of Memory. New York: Columbia University Press.

Sayigh, Rosemary. 1998. "Palestinian Camp Women as Tellers of History." Journal of Palestine Studies 27, no. 2: 42-58.

Sayigh, Rosemary. 2002. "The History of the Palestinian Oral history: Individual vitality and Institutional Paralysis." Al-Jana, Vol. 2.

Sayigh, Rosemary. 2007a. "Nakba Stories: Between Being and Knowing." In Nakba: Palestine, 1948, and the Claims of Memory, edited by S a'di, A. and Abu-Lughod, L. New York: Columbia University Press.

Sayigh, Rosemary. 2007b. "Product and Producer of Palestinian History: Stereotypes of "Self" In Camps Women's Life Stories." Journal of Middle East Women's Studies 3, no. 1: 86-105.

Sayigh, Yezid. 1997. Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949-1993. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Salih Ruba, 2013. "From Bare Lives to Political Agents: Palestinian Refugees as Avant-Garde." Refugee Survey Quarterly 32, No. 2: 66-91.

Salih Ruba, Lynn Welchman and Elena Zambelli. 2017. The Palestinian Youth Movement (PYM): transnational politics, inter/national frameworks and intersectional alliances. <http://www.iai.it/en/pubblicazioni/palestinian-youth-movement-pym>

Salih, Ruba, and Sophie Richter-Devroe. forthcoming. Palestinian Refugees. The politics of exile and the politics of return. Cambridge University Press.

Salih, Ruba. 2017. "Bodies That Walk, Bodies That Talk, Bodies That Love: Palestinian Women Refugees, Affectivity, and the Politics of the Ordinary." Antipode. Volume 49, Issue 3. 742–760

- Sabbagh, Suha, ed. 1998. Palestinian women of Gaza and the West Bank. Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press.
- Said, Edward. 2002 Reflections on Exile and Other Essays. Harvard University Press.
- Sassen, Saskia. 1998 "The De Facto Transnationalizing of Immigration Policy" in Globalization and Its Discontents, The New Press, New York, pp. 5-30.
- Scott, James C. 1985. Weapons of the Weak: Everyday Forms of Peasant Resistance. New haven: Yale University Press
- Shalhoub-Kevorkian, Nadirah. 2009. Militarization and Violence against Women in Conflict Zones in the Middle East: A Palestinian Case-Study. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Shafir, Gershon. 1996. Land, Labor and the Origins of the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict 1882-1914. Berkeley, California: University of California Press.
- Shokeid, Moshe. 1992. "Commitment and Contextual Study in Anthropology." Cultural Anthropology, 7: 464–477.
- Simpson, Audra. 2014. Theorizing Native Studies. Durham: Duke University Press
- Slymovics, Susan. 1998. Object of Memory: Arab and Jew Narrate the Palestinian Village. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Glick-Schiller, Nina, Linda Basch, and Cristina Blanc-Szanton. 1992. "Towards a Transnational Perspective on Migration." in Race, Class, Ethnicity, and Nationalism Reconsidered. New York: New York Academy of Sciences.
- Stein, Rebecca L. and Ted Swedenburg. 2005. "Introduction: Popular Culture, Transnationality, and Radical History." In Palestine, Israel, and the politics of popular culture, edited by Rebecca L. Stein, and Ted Swedenburg. Durham: Duke University Press.
- Swedenburg, Ted. 1989. "Occupational Hazards: Palestine Ethnography." Cultural Anthropology 4, no.3: 265–72.
- Swedenburg, Ted. 1992. "Occupational Hazards Revisited: Reply to Moshe Shokeid." Cultural Anthropology 7, no. 4: 478–495.
- Swedenburg, Ted. 1995. Memories of Revolt: The 1936–1939 Rebellion and the Struggle for a Palestinian National Past. Minneapolis, Minn: University of Minnesota Press.
- Tamari, Salim. 2008. Mountain against the sea: Essays on Palestinian society and culture. Los Angeles: University of California Press.
- Tully, James. 2000. "The Struggles of Indigenous Peoples for and of Freedom." In Political theory and the rights of indigenous peoples, edited by Duncan Ivison, Paul Patton and Will Sanders, 36. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Van Teeffelen, Toin. 2007. Challenging the Wall: Toward a Pedagogy of Hope. Bethlehem: Bethlehem Arabic Educational Institute.

Veracini, Lorenzo. 2013. "The Other Shift: Settler Colonialism, Israel, and the Occupation" Journal of Palestine Studies, Vol. XLII, No. 2, pp. 26–42

Veracini, Lorenzo. 2010. Settler Colonialism: A Theoretical Overview. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan

Wolfe, Patrick. 1999. Settler colonialism and the transformation of anthropology: The politics and poetics of an ethnographic event. London: Cassel.

Wolfe, Patrick. 2006. "Settler colonialism and the elimination of the native." Journal of Genocide Research 8, no. 4: 387-409.

Yiftachel, Oren. 2006. Ethnocracy: Land and identity politics in Israel/Palestine. Philadelphia, Pennsylvania: University of Pennsylvania Press.