The Formation of the Civilian Elite in the Syrian Province: The Case of Ayyubid and Early Mamluk Ḥamāh

INTRODUCTION

In recent decades our knowledge of urban history in northern Mesopotamia, Syria, and Egypt during the post-formative period has continuously increased.¹ Studies such as those by Douglas Patton on Zangid Mosul, Anne-Marie Eddé on Ayyubid Aleppo, Louis Pouzet on thirteenth-century Damascus, Michael Chamberlain on thirteenth- and fourteenth-century Damascus, Carl Petry on fifteenth-century Cairo, Bernadette Martel-Thoumian on the fifteenth-century Mamluk state, and others have added significantly to our knowledge of pre-modern Middle Eastern society.² A particular concern of these studies has been the section of the population that Petry termed the “civilian elite,” i.e., the ulama and the non-military administrative personnel whom biographers regarded as notables.³

The present article further extends this stream of research by discussing the

³ Petry, Civilian Elite, 4 and 312–25. There are a number of individuals who crossed the boundary between the military and the civilian elite who do not fit into this simple differentiation. In the case of Ḥamāh this is illustrated by Shihāb al-Dīn al-Bulāʿī, who turned to the military profession after a career as religious scholar (Ibn Wāṣil, Mufarrij al-Kurūb fī Akhbār Banī Ayyūb, ed. Jamāl al-Dīn al-Shayyāl, Ḥasanayn al-Rabīʿ, and Saʿīd ʿĀshūr [Cairo, 1953–77], and for years 646–59 Bibliothèque Nationale MSS Arabe nos. 1702 and 1703; here published edition, 3:163), and the case of Shihāb al-Dīn ibn al-Quṭub, which is discussed below. example of the middle-sized north Syrian town of Ḥamāh during the period from the late sixth/twelfth to the eighth/fourteenth centuries. This urban settlement, situated on the banks of the Orontes River and with a population of some 7,000⁴ during the period considered here, tended to stand in the shadow of neighboring Aleppo and Damascus. In the late fourth/tenth century it was included within the Aleppan realms of the Hamdanid ruler Sayf al-Dawlah (d. 356/967). In the following century this status of dependency continued with Ḥamāh either in the Fatimid sphere of influence or subject to Bedouin, especially Mirdasid, domination typical of this period in northern Syria. With the Saljuq conquest of Aleppo in 479/1086 Ḥamāh became a bone of contention in conflicts between the autonomous Saljuq rulers in the Syrian lands. It changed hands repeatedly until the founder of the Burid dynasty in Damascus, Ṭuḡtigin (d. 522/1128), incorporated it into his realm in 517/1123.⁵ This period ended with the conquest by the Zangids who in 530/1135 included the town in their emerging empire, which gradually extended into Syria and al-Jazīrah. During the Ayyubid period the princes of Ḥamāh gained some degree of independence within the Ayyubid family confederation after Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn had handed over the town to his nephew al-Malik al-Muẓaffar I ‘Umar (r. 574–87/1178–91). Al-Muẓaffar’s descendants and other members of the Ayyubid family were able to rule the town, with short interruptions, well into the early Mamluk period when this last Syrian Ayyubid principality was finally absorbed into the Mamluk administrative system in the 730s/1330s.

From an economic perspective, Ḥamāh could draw on the fertile soil of the surrounding lands, ample water supplies, and its location on the main north-south trade axis linking Aleppo and Damascus.⁶ However, while Egypt experienced economic prosperity during the fifth/eleventh century,⁷ the northern Syrian towns, like their north Mesopotamian and Iraqi counterparts, experienced a period of urban stagnation or even decline. The weakening of fiscal institutions and the near-complete absence of building activities during this period was characteristic of this decline. The predominant Bedouin rulers of northern Syria did little to support the region's urban network. With the establishment of Saljuq rule the towns of the region experienced a renaissance that continued during the Zangid, Ayyubid, and Mamluk periods. The Saljuqs' measures, especially those of the regional Atabeg dynasties, aimed at supporting their urban basis, most importantly through a reorganization of the fiscal system, and were accompanied by increased building activities.⁸

The disastrous Syrian earthquake in the year 552/1157 was a setback in the case of Ḥamāh's ascendancy. The epicenter was close to the town and further seismic shocks followed in subsequent months.⁹ The destruction of the infrastructure must have been massive and the loss of human life considerable. The estimation of an Andalusian traveller who visited the town some fifteen years after the catastrophe, that of the purportedly 25,000 inhabitants of the town only 70 men survived, is certainly exaggerated.¹⁰ However, the chronicles show that this earthquake was estimated to be among the most disastrous catastrophes in the Syrian lands during the sixth/twelfth and seventh/thirteenth century. Anecdotes played, as is typical in premodern historiography, a crucial role in structuring the earthquake narrative. For instance, the Zangid chronicler Ibn al-Athīr included a report on a teacher leaving the teaching premises shortly before the earthquake. Not only did all of his students perish, but their relatives who might have inquired in the following days about the children's fate also did not survive.¹¹ In the same vein, later topographical descriptions of Ḥamāh are centered on this event. The only diachronic passage in Ibn al-ʿAdīm's seventh/thirteenth-century description of the town, for instance, sets the earthquake at center stage, and mentions the castle's destruction and the following efforts at refortification.¹² The consequences for the civilian elite are reflected in references to scholars who either perished in the earthquake or left the town in its aftermath.¹³ However, Ḥamāh soon recovered and continued to enjoy “[i]n the Ayyūbid period, and during the governorship of Abū ‘l-Fidā’, . . . true prosperity.”¹⁴ This prosperity can be seen here, as elsewhere, in increased building activities, especially with regard to madrasahs, which will be discussed below.

The present article traces this urban renaissance in more detail by focusing on the civilian elite. The construction of a high number of endowed madrasahs provided the financial basis for a variety of civilian careers.¹⁵ However, the source material currently available precludes a systematic examination of career patterns based on endowments in the case of a middle-sized town such as Ḥamāh. Consequently, the following discussion will focus on holders of judgeships and will be subsequently supplemented by the fragmentary material available on khaṭībs, secretaries, and posts in madrasahs. This discussion will show the gradual formation of an indigenous civilian elite during this period that was increasingly able to monopolize the crucial civilian posts in the town.

The purpose of the present article in engaging with the case of the civilian elite in Ḥamāh is twofold. Firstly, it has a descriptive outlook, namely to give an overview of those names that appear repeatedly when studying the civilian elite of the town. In the course of the description it will become evident that the basic unit of the civilian elite organization was the elite household. In this sense the article describes how such families established themselves in a provincial town. Secondly, it puts forth the argument that the urban renaissance in northern Syria set the framework for the development of a strong civilian elite from the second half of the sixth/twelfth century onwards. Furthermore, this urban elite took on a decisively local character during the seventh/thirteenth century and the first half of the eighth/fourteenth century.

Owing to the historiographical nature of the available sources, the focus is on chronicles and biographical dictionaries. The rise of historical writing from the seventh/thirteenth century allows the formation of the civilian elite, even in considering the case of a middle-sized town such as Ḥamāh, to be traced in some detail. This is because the prosperity enjoyed by the town also encouraged the publication of a multitude of historical works. Not only two rulers of the town, al-Malik al-Manṣūr I Muḥammad and Abū al-Fidā', but also a number of scholars or administrators from the town, such as Ibn al-Naẓīf (d. after 634/1236–37), Ibn Abī al-Dam (d. 642/1244), the latter's relative Ibn Wāṣil (d. 697/1298), and 'Alī al-Muẓaffarī Ibn al-Mughayzil (d. 701/1302), composed chronicles. Despite the fact that the royal chronicles are of rather limited interest for any inquiry into a field beyond politics, Ibn al-Naẓīf's work¹⁶ is rather focused on the neighboring town of Homs, and most of Ibn Abī al-Dam's chronicle is lost,¹⁷ these works, especially the chronicle of Ibn Wāṣil and its supplement by Ibn al-Mughayzil, allow insights into the town's development. Although these insights cannot be compared with those gained for major urban centers, such as Cairo, Damascus, and Aleppo, the focus on this middle-sized town is a crucial addition to our understanding of urban society in the Syrian lands during the seventh/thirteenth and eighth/fourteenth centuries.

ḤAMĀH'S GROWING PROSPERITY: MADRASAHS AND THE CIVILIAN ELITE

The considerable ascent of Ḥamāh after the earthquake setback in 552/1157 can be traced by turning to the building activities within the town, which are well illustrated by the number of endowed madrasahs. These testify to the dynamic development of the urban infrastructure during the late Zangid, Ayyubid, and early Mamluk periods. The starting point of this development in Ḥamāh was in the late Zangid period under the Sultan Nūr al-Dīn (d. 569/1174). Nūr al-Dīn initiated a considerable building project encompassing representative and functional buildings, not only in the major towns of his realms such as Damascus and Aleppo but also in middle-sized towns such as Baalbek and Ḥamāh.¹⁸ In Ḥamāh he built two madrasahs, one Shafi‘i and one Hanafi, in addition to the mosque in the lower town with a hospital next to it.¹⁹ The Shafi‘i madrasah, the ‘Aṣrūniyah, was built for Sharaf al-Dīn Ibn Abī ‘Aṣrūn (d. 585/1189), who indeed taught there at least once.²⁰ It was situated, similarly to the Hanafi madrasah, in the market area of the lower town. Eminent scholars of the indigenous civilian elite, such as the town’s shaykh al-shuyūkh Tāj al-Dīn Aḥmad Ibn al-Mughayzil (d. 687/1288)²¹ and the town’s judge ‘Imād al-Dīn Abū al-Qāsim (d. 652/1254), taught there.²²

In the following century, members of the ruling Ayyubid family endowed additional madrasahs. Al-Malik al-Manṣūr I Muḥammad (d. 617/1221) founded the Shafi‘i Madrasah al-Manṣūrīyah.²³ This madrasah proved attractive even to a prominent scholar from outside the town, Sayf al-Dīn al-Āmidī (d. 631/1233), its first teacher.²⁴ In the later Ayyubid period Mu‘nisah Khātūn bint al-Malik al-Muẓaffar II Maḥmūd (d. 703/1303) endowed the Madrasah al-Khātūniyah. She was the paternal aunt of the town’s last Ayyubid ruler during the Mamluk period, Abū al-Fidā’ (r. 710–32/1310–32). Having acted herself as attending authority (musmi‘ah) in scholarly readings she provided this school with a generous endowment.²⁵ Abū al-Fidā’ himself endowed the Madrasah al-Mu‘ayyadiyah (also known as al-Khaṭībīyah), in which members of grand Hamawian families such as ‘Abd al-Laṭīf Ibn al-Mughayzil (d. 690/1291) and Ṣadr al-Dīn Muḥammad Ibn al-Bārīzī (d. 875/1470)²⁶ taught.

The military elite formed the second group of madrasah founders. Sayf al-Dīn ‘Alī Ibn al-Masḥūb (d. 588/1192), one of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn’s amirs, founded Madrasat Ibn al-Masḥūb. A freedman of the town’s first Ayyubid ruler, al-Malik al-Muẓaffar I ‘Umar, Abū Manṣūr Jaldak al-Muẓaffarī al-Taḳawī (d. 628/1231), endowed the Madrasah al-Jaldakīyah.²⁷ Shujā‘ al-Dīn Murshid al-Ṭawāshī (d. 669/1270–71), a freedman of al-Malik al-Muẓaffar II Maḥmūd, set up the Hanafī Madrasah al-Ṭawāshīyah.²⁸ Finally, members of the civilian elite endowed a number of madrasahs, which illustrates the wealth of these families of notables. Among these civilian founders were Najm al-Dīn ‘Abd al-Ghuffār Ibn al-Mughayzil (d. 688/1289–90),²⁹ Zayn al-Dīn ‘Abd al-Raḥmān (d. 659/1261), khaṭīb of the Great/Upper Mosque,³⁰ and Mukhlīṣ al-Dīn Ibrāhīm Ibn Qarnāṣ (d. 648/1248).³¹

This rise of the madrasah as an urban institution from the mid-sixth/twelfth century onwards was paralleled by the formation of an urban elite that was firmly entrenched within the town itself. In contrast, the sources are almost completely silent, typically for northern Syria, with regard to the civilian elite in Ḥamāh in the preceding period. This might be explained as a result of chronological distance in the case of the works composed during the seventh/thirteenth century, such as the chronicle Mirʾāt al-Zamān by Sibṭ ibn al-Jawzī (d. 654/1256) or the biographical dictionaries Wafayāt al-Aʿyān by Ibn Khallikān (d. 681/1281–82), Muʿjam al-Udabāʾ by Yāqūt al-Ḥamawī (d. 626/1229), and Bughyat al-Ṭalab by Ibn al-ʿAdīm (d. 660/1262), which rendered the events or persons linked to minor towns of limited significance.³² However, even a contemporary work such as Ibn ʿAsākīr’s (d. 571/1176) Tārīkh Madīnat Dimashq, which covers the Syrian scholars well beyond the borders of the town of Damascus, has little to say about scholars originating from or being active in Ḥamāh—in contrast to those linked, for example, to neighboring Homs.³³ Even appointments to the most eminent position, the chief judgeship, can only be traced systematically starting with the late sixth/twelfth century.³⁴ This picture is not altered when taking into account

³¹ Mentioned in al-Yūnīnī, Dhayl Mirʾāt al-Zamān, 2:127–28. Further madrasahs founded by members of the civilian elite included, for example, the Madrasah al-Ṣihyawniyah, founded by Muḥammad ibn Muḥammad al-Khaṭīb Ibn Ṣihyawī. Among its teachers was Ibrāhīm ibn ‘Abd Allāh al-Ḥamawī al-Shāfi‘ī (d. 649/1251) (cf. al-Dhahabī, Tārīkh, vol. 641–50:413).

³⁴ Similar to the case of al-Raqqah, where the names of the chief judges are only known from the mid-sixth/twelfth century onwards (Heidemann, Renaissance, 284–85).

the works produced in Ḥamāh: while chronicles such as those by Abū al-Fidā³ or Ibn Wāṣil are indispensable in order to trace the civilian elite starting with the second half of the sixth/twelfth century, they have little to say about earlier periods.

Considering the civilian elite, a striking feature becomes apparent that parallels the rise of the madrasah and which hints again at the mid-late sixth/twelfth century as a decisive turning point in the urban history of the Syrian lands: the first relevant persons, in a sense the “founding fathers,” of those families that came to dominate the civilian elite in the Ayyubid and Mamluk periods in Ḥamāh were active during this period (Banū Rawāḥah, Banū al-Bahrānī, Banū Qarnās) or in the following decades of the early seventh/thirteenth century (Banū al-Bārīzī, Banū al-Mughayzil). The formation of this civilian elite, particularly the indigenous civilian elite, will be discussed in the following in three sections: First, appointments to the Shafi‘i judgeship, the crucial position in the town, are considered. This is followed by an analysis of the khatībs, secretaries, and non-Shafi‘i judges. Finally, those grand scholarly families of the town that did not hold a large number of civilian posts will be discussed.

THE SHAFI‘I JUDGESHIP: LOCALS AND COSMOPOLITANS

Ḥamāh became, as was typical for the region, dominated by the Shafi‘i school of law and affiliation with it became one of the prerequisites for attaining prestigious religious posts during the Zangid and subsequent periods. All the grand local households discussed below were Shafi‘i. This madhhab was sponsored by the political elite, which furthered its dominant role. For instance, the town’s last Ayyubid ruler, Abū al-Fidā³, and its Mamluk governor Sanjar were both themselves Shafi‘i jurists³⁵ who supported the madhhab. This dominance is evident in the appointments to the town’s judgeship during the early phase of the period considered here. The judgeship of Ḥamāh had initially not been explicitly restricted to any specific school of law. It was only with the introduction of the other madhhabs’ judgeships in the late seventh/thirteenth and eighth/fourteenth centuries that this judgeship became to be nominally attached to the Shafi‘i community. However, despite the theoretical possibility that a non-Shafi‘i scholar might be appointed before this introduction of madhhab-affiliated posts, the Shafi‘is were able, owing to their dominance, to monopolise the post entirely.

Appointments to the Shafi‘i judgeship (cf. fig. 1) followed, with regard to the geographical origin of the post holders, distinctively different patterns during the period considered here. While individuals from outside the town prevailed in the first stage until the early seventh/thirteenth century, the local elite dominated this post in the following 150 years until the mid-eighth/fourteenth century. Thereupon, the post holders' provenance became significantly more varied and the dominance of the local elite started to vanish. These different patterns indicate two alternative career patterns—that changed in importance over time—which led to the post.

In the first and third phase, a “cosmopolitan” profile was decisive for the candidate's appointment.³⁶ It was crucial to belong to trans-regional networks of learning and/or political power. Many of the post holders, especially during the first phase, were distinguished scholars who had the prestige of having studied with the grand scholars of their time. In the third phase candidates belonged more often to the trans-regional Mamluk civilian elite. Owing to the integration of trans-regional networks, judges who left the post voluntarily or involuntarily during both phases frequently moved on to take up positions in other towns and regions.

In the second phase, in contrast, post holders typically had a “local” profile, i.e., they were closely integrated into the local network of influential families. Generally, they were born into one of the grand families and followed a career centered on the town, especially holding other (minor) posts before attaining the judgeship. In contrast to the preceding and following phases, judges often held the post until an advanced age or death. Those who left the post voluntarily or involuntarily tended to remain within the town, as it was here that they had networks that had been—and often continued to be—crucial for their career.

THE SHAFĪI JUDGESHIP FROM 559/1164 TO 616/1219: THE COSMOPOLITANS' PERIOD

During the first sixty years of the period under discussion cosmopolitan scholars from outside the town played an important role in appointments to the judgeship. Initially these scholars originated in particular from the eastern lands, more specifically Mosul, the Zangid dynasty's first stronghold. In a sense the Zangids “imported” prestigious scholars from their possessions in the East to newly conquered towns such as Ḥamāh. These scholars tended to hold the post—typical for the cosmopolitan career pattern—only for a limited period and soon moved on to other urban centers.

The first judge, Muḥammad ibn 'Alī al-Anṣārī (d. 600/1203),³⁷ came from Mosul under the Zangid Nūr al-Dīn. He stayed in the post for eight years, but then moved on further west in order to settle in Egypt, where he was appointed to the judgeship of the Upper Egyptian town of Asyūṭ. The second judge, Ḍiyā³ al-Dīn al-Qāsim Ibn al-Shahrazūrī (d. 599/1203), held the judgeship twice: he had left Ḥamāh after his first appointment in order to move to Baghdad, where he was also appointed judge. However, after his deposition in Baghdad he had to return to Ḥamāh, where he filled the post again for some months until his death. Ibn al-Shahrazūrī belonged to a family which held high offices throughout the sixth/twelfth and seventh/thirteenth centuries in Syria and Iraq.³⁸ His paternal uncle, Kamāl al-Dīn Muḥammad (d. 576/1176), like al-Anṣārī, came from Mosul and had been appointed by Nūr al-Dīn to the judgeships of Damascus and Aleppo simultaneously.

That this family originated from Mosul and subsequently gained a great reputation within Syria parallels the shift of the Zangids' power base from the East westwards. This shift also became apparent in the nominations to the judgeship in Ḥamāh: after the first decades of Zangid rule, post holders were increasingly recruited from the Syrian lands. The early seventh/thirteenth-century judge Najm al-Dīn 'Abd al-Raḥīm Ibn Abī 'Aṣrūn (d. 622/1225),³⁹ for instance, was the son of the aforementioned Sharaf al-Dīn Ibn Abī 'Aṣrūn, for whom Nūr al-Dīn had built the Shafī'i madrasah of the town. Sharaf al-Dīn had succeeded Kamāl al-Dīn al-Shahrazūrī in the position of the most eminent Shafī'i scholar in the Syrian lands and more specifically he had taken over the judgeship in Damascus. It was the family's cosmopolitan prestige that allowed his son to hold office in Aleppo and Ḥamāh, where he was twice judge and also vizier. Najm al-Dīn is in this sense representative of a transition period: his family still had hardly any connections to the local elite of Ḥamāh, but it was already well-placed within the civilian elite of the Syrian lands.

In this early period there are already three cases which hint at the developing local elite, most importantly two judges belonging to the al-Bahrānī family (cf. fig. 2 with sources), Amīn al-Dawlah/Dīn al-Ḥusayn (d. 587/1191) and Aḥmad ibn Mudrak (d. 590/1194 or 591/1195). This family also continued to play a remarkable role in the following seventh/thirteenth century. Two additional members of the family, Muḥyī al-Dīn Ḥamzah (d. 663/1264–65)⁴⁰ and Muwaffaq al-Dīn Muḥammad (d. 699/1300), were appointed judges in 642/1244–45 and ³⁸ On the al-Shahrazūrī family, cf. Eddé, Alep, 381–82. It seems that al-Anṣārī and al-Shahrazūrī for some time held the judgeship in Ḥamāh simultaneously (cf. Abū Shāmah, Al-Rawḍatayn, 2:158, and al-Dhahabī, Tārīkh, vol. 571–80:105). On al-Qāsim cf. Ibn Wāṣil, Mufarrij, 4:79; al-Dhahabī, Tārīkh, vol. 591–600:407–8.

697/1298 respectively. Other members of the family focused on scholarship without attaining formal positions of importance, such as Muḥyī al-Dīn's wife Ṣafiyat (d. 646/1248), one of the grand female hadith scholars of her time; Muwaffaq al-Dīn Nabā/Muḥammad (d. 665/1267), a hadith scholar who was at least appointed repetitor (mu'īd) in Cairo; as well as 'Umar ibn Muḥammad (d. 654/1256) and Muḥyī al-Dīn 'Abd al-Wahhāb (d. 688/1289), son and grandson of Ṣafiyat respectively.

The third relevant case—although he only briefly held office—is Zayn al-Dīn Muḥammad Ibn al-Raffā' (d. 617/1220), who originated from Kafarṭāb (some 40 km to the north of the town).⁴¹ He moved on to take the judgeship of neighboring Bārīn (some 40 km southwest of the town). His son 'Abd al-'Azīz (d. 662/1263)⁴² was to become the shaykh al-shuyūkh of Ḥamāh and entered the networks of the Hamawian civilian elite by marrying his daughters to members of the influential al-Mughayzil family. However, it is significant that neither the indigenous al-Bahrānī family nor Ibn al-Raffā' were yet able to control the post more tightly. Both lost it to Ibn Abī 'Aṣrūn, the outsider who was twice appointed to the post.

Tellingly, Ibn Abī 'Aṣrūn's second office—the last of the cosmopolitan period—came to an end owing to his involvement in an event that had implications well beyond the confines of the town: the Ibn al-Mashtūb revolt of 616–17/1219–20. 'Imād al-Dīn Aḥmad ibn al-Mashtūb (d. 619/1225), a high-ranking Kurdish amir and son of the aforementioned madrasah founder Sayf al-Dīn Ibn al-Mashtūb, had been exiled from Egypt after an attempted revolt against the sultan al-Malik al-Kāmil (r. 615–35/1218–38). He found refuge in Ḥamāh and subsequently entered the service of the strongman in northern Syria, al-Malik al-Ashraf Mūsā (r. 607–17/1210–20 in Diyarbakr), whom he challenged soon after. Al-Malik al-Manṣūr I Muḥammad of Ḥamāh supported him financially and provided armed men. Furthermore, he authorised Ibn Abī 'Aṣrūn, to whom Ibn al-Mashtūb had promised an appointment as judge in the lands that were to be brought under his control, to resign and to participate in the endeavour.⁴³

Ibn Abī 'Aṣrūn was arrested after Ibn al-Mashtūb's defeat and the entire correspondence with rulers of the region as well as copies of the oath of allegiance to be sworn by those allied with Ibn al-Mashtūb were found in his possession. Nevertheless, in contrast to Ibn al-Mashtūb, who perished in al-Ashraf's captivity, Ibn Abī 'Aṣrūn was liberated owing to his family connections, which went well beyond Ḥamāh. It was Fakhr al-Dīn ibn Shaykh al-Shuyūkh (d. 647/1250), the influential member of the Damascene Ḥamawayh family, which had intermarried with the Banū Abī ‘Aṣrūn, who came as Egyptian envoy to al-Ashraf’s court. He convinced al-Ashraf to release Ibn Abī ‘Aṣrūn, who returned to Ḥamāh without regaining a formal position of influence.⁴⁴

THE SHAFI‘I JUDGESHIP FROM 616/1219 TO 764/1363: THE DOMINANCE OF THE LOCALS

With Ibn Abī ‘Aṣrūn’s resignation in the early seventh/thirteenth century the second period in the recruitment pattern for the judgeship began. For some 150 years the judgeship was entirely monopolized by local scholars while cosmopolitan outsiders, be they from the neighboring large towns of Aleppo and Damascus or from Mosul, ceased to play an important role in Ḥamāh. In this period the urban renaissance began to bear fruit and a strong local civilian elite was able to gain complete control over the post. Particularly notable with regard to the judgeship were three of the town’s grand families, the Banū Wāṣil, the Banū al-Bahrānī discussed above, and the Banū al-Bārīzī.

The al-Bārīzī family (cf. fig. 3)⁴⁵ was at the very core of the Hamawian civilian elite. It was able to monopolise the judgeship for some 120 years during the late seventh/thirteenth and eighth/fourteenth centuries with only one interruption. The first notable individual of this family, Shams al-Dīn Ibrāhīm I (d. 669/1270),⁴⁶ specialised in jurisprudence, and taught and studied in various Syrian towns until he settled in his hometown. Here he taught, composed works, issued fatwas, and was finally appointed as the town’s judge. He bequeathed this position upon his death to his deputy and son Najm al-Dīn ‘Abd al-Raḥīm I (d. 683/1284),⁴⁷ a multidisciplinary scholar. Najm al-Dīn was deposed after some ten years of holding office in favour of Jamāl al-Dīn Muḥammad Ibn Wāṣil (see below), but this did not loosen the grip of the Banū al-Bārīzī on the post. A member of the clan was reappointed two years after Ibn Wāṣil's death and a short interlude by one of the Banū al-Bahrānī, Muwaffaq al-Dīn Muḥammad (d. 699/1300).

This member was Sharaf al-Dīn Hibat Allāh I (d. 738/1338),⁴⁸ Najm al-Dīn's son, who was the most famous member of his family. He not only held the judgeship for forty years, but was also wealthy enough to dispense with the salary. Although he was offered the judgeship in Egypt, he preferred to stay within the confines of his hometown where he was embedded via his family into a tight network with members of the civilian elite. He passed the post on to his grandson and deputy Najm al-Dīn 'Abd al-Raḥīm II (d. 764/1363),⁴⁹ whose death marked the end of the Banū al-Bārīzī's grip on the judgeship. However, the influence of the family extended beyond the judgeship to other posts so that it was able to retain crucial influence in the town despite having lost control of the judgeship. Further civilian posts held by this family in Ḥamāh included the deputyship of the judge,⁵⁰ teaching positions,⁵¹ and administrative positions (kātib al-sirr,⁵² wakīl bayt al-māl,⁵³ and vizier⁵⁴).

Members of the family were still appointed in the following decades to the judgeship. Now it was the second main line of al-Bārīzīs in Ḥamāh—going back to Sharaf al-Dīn's brother Kamāl al-Dīn Muḥammad I (d. 698/1299)—that started to play a more prominent role.⁵⁵ However, the careers of Kamāl al-Dīn's descendants show that the al-Bārīzīs had been transformed from a typical local family of Ḥamāh into one with a cosmopolitan outlook. Nāṣir al-Dīn Muḥammad II (d. 823/1420),⁵⁶ Kamāl al-Dīn's great-grandson, quickly abandoned the judgeship in

⁵⁰ Besides those who later became judge themselves, such as Najm al-Dīn 'Abd al-Raḥīm I and Najm al-Dīn 'Abd al-Raḥīm II, other members of the family remained deputies, such as Zayn al-Dīn 'Umar (mentioned in the biography of his grandson Nāṣir al-Dīn Muḥammad III [d. 847/1443–44]: al-Sakhāwī, Al-Daw', 10:69). Zayn al-Dīn deputized for his brother Najm al-Dīn 'Abd al-Raḥīm II and for Fakhr al-Dīn 'Uthmān (d. 730/1330), who became judge in Aleppo and khaṭīb in Ḥamāh (Abū al-Fidā', Al-Mukhtaṣar, 4:100–1; al-Dhahabī, Tārīkh, vol. 661–70:274; idem, Dhayl Tārīkh al-Islām wa-Wafayāt al-Mashāhīr wa-al-A'lām, ed. order to become secretary of the chancellery in Ḥamāh, judge in Aleppo, and finally secretary of the chancellery in Egypt. Here, his descendants attained positions in the Mamluk military and administrative elite.⁵⁷ His son Shihāb al-Dīn Aḥmad I (d. 822/1419),⁵⁸ who opted for a military career, rose to such high rank that the sultan al-Malik al-Muʿayyad (815–24/1412–21) attended his funeral. The other son, Kamāl al-Dīn Muḥammad III (d. 856/1452), succeeded his father in the post of kātib al-sirr in Egypt, which he held alternately with the same post in Damascus where he was also appointed chief judge for a while. He married into the sultan's family and the reigning sultan, al-Malik al-Ẓāhir Jaqmaq (842–57/1438–53), was present at his funeral.⁵⁹

Back in Ḥamāh, Sharaf al-Dīn's great grandson Nāṣir al-Dīn Muḥammad I (d. 812/1409–10)⁶⁰ reinstated the pivotal role of his family in the town's judgeship. Although the family was no longer able to monopolize the post, two more al-Bārīzī judges in the ninth/fifteenth century, Ṣadr al-Dīn Muḥammad (d. 875/1470)⁶¹ and Sirāj al-Dīn ʿUmar (b. 844/1440),⁶² are evidence of continuing influence. However, these appointments hint again at the transformation of the al-Bārīzīs from a local to a cosmopolitan family. Appointments of family members in Ḥamāh now depended less on a local network than on the influence of the developing Egyptian al-Bārīzī branch. For instance, it was Kamāl al-Dīn Muḥammad III who interceded with Sultan Jaqmaq in Egypt for the appointment of Ṣadr al-Dīn Muḥammad to the judgeship of Ḥamāh.⁶³

Another family, besides the Banū al-Bārīzī and the Banū al-Bahrānī, that was of some importance for the judgeship was the Banū Wāṣil. This clan played a role in the civilian elite of Ḥamāh throughout the seventh/thirteenth century. Three members of the family were appointed judges: Sālīm (d. 629/1232),⁶⁴ the historian Jamāl al-Dīn Muḥammad (deputized by his brother),⁶⁵ and Shihāb al-Dīn Ibrāhīm Ibn Abī al-Dam,⁶⁶ who was linked to the Banū Wāṣil clan via Sālīm's wife. Another son of Sālīm was an intimate of the Hamawian ruler al-Malik al-Manṣūr II Muḥammad (d. 683/1284) and one of his nephews was physician at the Hamawian court. Jamāl al-Dīn's appointment shows that even during the period of local recruitment trans-regional networks were of benefit. The reasons for the deposition of his predecessor Najm al-Dīn al-Bārīzī are not known, but one might assume that Jamāl al-Dīn's tight network within the military and civilian elite of late Ayyubid and early Mamluk society was instrumental in his appointment.⁶⁷ However, the influence of this family was in sum rather limited, as it was not able to monopolize specific posts and only rose to some prominence for two generations.

During the period of local recruitment to the judgeship in Ḥamāh some individuals who did not belong to the grand families of the town were appointed. These individuals were nevertheless part of the civilian networks of the town and had the local background that was typical of this period of recruitment. 'Imād al-Dīn Abū al-Qāsim (d. 652/1254) held the judgeship twice but had to flee owing to the conflicts of his brother, Shihāb al-Dīn ibn al-Quṭub, with the town's ruler.⁶⁸ Shihāb al-Dīn had initially embarked on a civilian career, acting for example as Sayf al-Dīn al-Āmidī's repetitor (mu'id) in the Madrasah al-Manṣūriyah. However, he turned later to a military career and became an amir.⁶⁹ Although their family was of no great importance within the civilian elite,⁷⁰ their marriage connections secured them the necessary local backing. ‘Imād al-Dīn’s wife, for instance, was the daughter of a prominent member of the Banū Qarnās, Mukhlīṣ al-Dīn Ibrāhīm (d. 648/1248), discussed below.

‘Imād al-Dīn’s predecessor, Ḥujjat al-Dīn Ibn Marājil (d. 617/1220),⁷¹ also did not belong to one of the grand families. Nevertheless, his family, which was at least described as “a renowned household in Ḥamāh,” had a somewhat prominent standing,⁷² particularly due to its holding of administrative positions. Ḥujjat al-Dīn’s nephew, ‘Afif al-Dīn ‘Abd Allāh, acted as envoy for the Ayyubid rulers of the town.⁷³ Ishāq ibn ‘Alī Ibn Marājil (d. after 658/1260) was secretary of the chancellery under al-Malik al-Muẓaffar II Maḥmūd, before moving on to Cairo where he held the same position.⁷⁴ Members of the family also held administrative posts in other Syrian towns, such as Damascus and Aleppo.⁷⁵

The dwindling grip of the indigenous elite on the Shafi‘i judgeship in the third period, that is from the death of Najm al-Dīn ‘Abd al-Raḥīm II in 764/1363 onwards, is evident in the much more varied background of those appointed to the post. Most importantly, judges tended to be recruited from cosmopolitan individuals who had, just like the judges in the first period of the judgeship, hardly any connections to the town. A case in point is Najm al-Dīn ‘Umar ibn al-Ḥijjī (d. 830/1427). During his career Najm al-Dīn was secretary of the chancellery in Egypt and judge in Damascus, Tripoli, and Ḥamāh without being linked to the local elite of the town.⁷⁶ This trend of cosmopolitan candidates

His father Shihāb al-Dīn ‘Abd al-Raḥīm had been secretary in different functions in Aleppo and Damascus (al-Ṣafadī, Al-Wāfi, 21:234–35). His son Taqī al-Dīn Sulaymān ibn ‘Alī (d. 764/1363) was employed in several dīwāns, held the trusteeship in the Umayyad Mosque in Damascus, and moved on to Egypt to become vizier (Ibn Ḥajar, Al-Durar, 2:254–55; Ibn Taghribirdī, Al-Nujūm, 11:18).

⁷⁶ On him cf. al-Sakhāwī, Al-Daw’, 6:78; Ibn Qāḍī Shuhbah, Ṭabaqāt, 4:122–27; Martel-Thoumian, Civils, 61, 88, 96, 452. was accompanied by a significantly enhanced turnover. The average length for holding the judgeship now halved to under seven years, compared with more than thirteen years in the preceding period of local dominance. There were still some local scholars appointed to the post, such as Shihāb al-Dīn Aḥmad al-Ḥamawī (d. 776/1374–75).⁷⁷ However, the example of the Bārīzī family—which could retain some influence over the judgeship only because it became a cosmopolitan family—shows that the period of the local scholars had definitely come to an end by the mid-eighth/fourteenth century.⁷⁸

THE NON-SHAFI‘I JUDGESHIPS, KHAṬĪBS, AND OTHER POSTS

The case of the Shafi‘i judgeship exemplifies the rise of the local civilian elite during the Ayyubid period and its continuing influence well into the Mamluk Sultanate until it lost its monopoly to candidates with a more cosmopolitan background. A consideration of appointments to other judgeships presents nevertheless a more complex picture. The Hanafi judgeship was established in Ḥamāh during the rule of the Mamluk sultan al-Malik al-Zāhir Baybars (r. 658–76/1260–77). In the 660s/1260s Baybars introduced the ruling according to which—at least theoretically—each madhhab was to be represented by a judge in the empire’s major centers. With regard to the judgeships for the other two madhhabs, Ḥamāh followed the normal course of affairs in provincial Syrian towns that only introduced them hesitantly:⁷⁹ both the first Maliki judge and the first Hanbali judge in Ḥamāh would be appointed only about a century after Baybars’ decree.

Al-Qalqashandī describes for his time the status quo that had developed in the preceding periods: in Ḥamāh judges for each madhhab, in addition to a Hanafi qāḍī ‘askar, were nominated (al-Qalqashandī, Ṣubḥ al-A‘shā fī Ṣinā‘at al-Inshā‘ [Cairo, 1913–19], 4:238).

some eighty years by the Banū al-ʿAdīm. The Hamawian Banū al-ʿAdīm branch retained its close links to Aleppo, where the Banū al-ʿAdīm were one of the most influential families within the civilian elite. For example, the deputy of the Hanafi judge Jamāl al-Dīn ʿAbd Allāh⁸¹ was sent to Ḥamāh from Aleppo by order of the Aleppan Hanafi judge, Kamāl al-Dīn Muḥammad ibn ʿUmar Ibn al-ʿAdīm (fl. 738/1337–38).⁸² However, the period of the Banū al-ʿAdīm in the Hamawian office had, parallel to the development of the Shafiʿi judgeship, a distinctive local character. The first Hanafi judge in Ḥamāh, Jamāl al-Dīn Muḥammad Ibn al-ʿAdīm (d. 694/1295), not only settled in the town but became part of the local elite. He was buried in his turbah in the cemetery in ʿAqabah Naqirīn, a village close to Ḥamāh where other Hamawian notables such as the Shafiʿi judge Jamāl al-Dīn Ibn Wāṣil had their turbahs built.⁸³ Furthermore, he was able to establish a kind of indigenous Hamawian line of succession as his son and grandson, Najm al-Dīn ʿUmar (d. 734/1333)⁸⁴ and Jamāl al-Dīn ʿAbd Allāh, held the post too. ʿIzz al-Dīn ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz Ibn al-ʿAdīm (d. 711/1311), the second Hanafi judge of the town, was appointed as an outsider, but remained in the office for some forty years and died in Ḥamāh.⁸⁵ The local tradition established by the Banū al-ʿAdīm was continued by Taqī al-Dīn Maḥmūd Ibn al-Ḥakīm (d. 760/1359),⁸⁶ who belonged to a Hamawian family that had a zāwiyah in the town and a muhtasib among its members.⁸⁷ With Taqī al-Dīn’s death in 760/1359 this local tradition came to an end. For instance, Amīn al-Dīn ‘Abd al-Wahhāb ibn Aḥmad (d. 768/1367), one of the subsequent judges, had no background in the town.⁸⁸ Thus, the role of the local background in appointments to the Hanafi judgeship started to disappear, similar to the Shafi‘i case, in the second half of the eighth/fourteenth century.

In this same period both the Maliki and the Hanbali judgeships were introduced. It is striking that in both cases local scholars from the outset played hardly any role, but that individuals with a cosmopolitan background dominated the list of post holders. The first Maliki judge in Ḥamāh (cf. fig. 5), Sharaf al-Dīn Ismā‘īl al-Gharnāṭī (d. 771/1369),⁸⁹ originated—as was typical for this madhhab—from the western Islamic lands. This predominance of post holders originating from the Maghrib or al-Andalus remained unchanged in the following decades: among them were Jamāl al-Dīn Muḥammad al-Maghribī (d. 795/1392),⁹⁰ Shams al-Dīn Muḥammad al-Maghribī (d. 840/1437),⁹¹ and, indirectly, Sharaf al-Dīn’s son Nāṣir al-Dīn Muḥammad (d. 828/1424).⁹² Equally important was Damascus, with which the Maliki community of Ḥamāh entertained close links, as illustrated by Shihāb al-Dīn Aḥmad al-Dimashqī (d. 796/1394)⁹³ and ‘Alam al-Dīn Muḥammad ibn Nāṣir al-Dīn (d. 805/1402).⁹⁴ The latter was deposed and reappointed some ten times as judge in Damascus and filled some of the resulting intervals with appointments to the judgeship of Ḥamāh.

The same is valid for the Hanbali judgeship, which was introduced roughly in the same period as the Maliki post. Its first holder, Aḥmad ibn ‘Abd al-Raḥmān al-Mardāwī (d. 787/1385–86),⁹⁵ was born in Mardā, a village close to Nablus which produced a number of Hanbali scholars active in Syria and Egypt.⁹⁶ He moved first to Damascus and then to Ḥamāh, where he was appointed to the judgeship and taught.⁹⁷ He was followed by his brother Taqī al-Dīn ‘Abd Allāh,⁹⁸ and among the post holders of the following decades, such as ‘Alā’ al-Dīn ‘Alī Ibn al-Maghli (d. 828/1424–25),⁹⁹ Shihāb al-Dīn Aḥmad Ibn al-Rassām (d. 844/1441),¹⁰⁰ Shihāb al-Dīn Aḥmad al-‘Abbāsī (d. 869/1464),¹⁰¹ his grandson Muḥyī al-Dīn ‘Abd al-Qādir,¹⁰² and ‘Abd al-Raḥmān ibn al-Kāzarūnī (d. 895/1489–90),¹⁰³ rarely can any specific link to Ḥamāh be detected.

This salience of outsiders in the case of the Maliki and the Hanbali judgeships cannot be directly linked to the shift from local to cosmopolitan post holders that was evident in the Shafi‘i case and to some degree also in the Hanafi case. Certainly, the introduction of the two former judgeships coincided with the period when the local elite also lost control over the Shafi‘i and the Hanafi judgeships to the benefit of individuals with a cosmopolitan background. However, the weak role of local families in appointments to the Maliki and the Hanbali judgeships can to a large degree be explained, as was the case in other towns,¹⁰⁴ by the quantitative weakness of these madhhabs in Ḥamāh. Arguably a similar quantitative weakness also explains the “importation” of the Hanafi Banū al-‘Adīm judges from Aleppo. These madhhabs’ weaknesses are apparent in the source material. The biographical dictionary by al-Dhahabī, Tārīkh al-Islām, for instance, shows hardly any entries for Hanafi, Maliki, and Hanbali scholars linked to Ḥamāh until the end of the seventh/thirteenth century. Similarly, madhhab-focused works, such as al-Qurashī’s (d. 775/1373) biographical dictionary of Hanafi scholars Al-Jawāhir al-Muḍīyah and Ibn Rajab’s (d. 795/1392) biographical dictionary of Hanbali scholars Al-Dhayl ‘alā Ṭabaqāt al-Ḥanābilah,¹⁰⁵ are rather silent on Ḥamāh.

Similarly, no Maliki or Hanbali madrasah is mentioned with regard to Ḥamāh, while the Hanafis were represented by two madrasahs, one founded by Nūr al-Dīn and the Madrasah al-Ṭawāshīyah. However, the teaching staff in Nūr al-Dīn’s madrasah was to a large extent comprised of scholars from outside the town. Shams al-Dīn Muḥammad Ibn al-Abyaḍ (d. 614/1217), for example, descended—just like the Banū al-‘Adīm—from an Aleppan Hanafi family. He had left Aleppo owing to conflicts with the central figure of the town’s madhhab, Iftikhār al-Dīn al-Hāshimī, and taught in Ḥamāh in 609/1212–13 but then returned to his teaching post in Aleppo.¹⁰⁶ Another teacher in this school was ‘Alam al-Dīn Qayṣar (d. 649/1251),¹⁰⁷ who had to leave Egypt owing to misconduct in his administrative post.¹⁰⁸ The relatively weak stature of the madhhab in the town certainly contributed to al-Malik al-Muẓaffar II Maḥmūd’s (r. 626–42/1229–44) decision to have this madrasah destroyed in 630/1232–33 during fortification works.¹⁰⁹

KHAṬĪBS AND OTHER POSTS: THE RISE OF THE BANŪ AL-MUGHAYZIL

Turning to those positions that are less well-documented in the sources, i.e., *khaṭīb*ships and other civilian posts, a development similar to that illustrated above for the Shafi‘i and the Hanafi judgeships emerges: from the mid-sixth/late twelfth century onwards the number of post holders rose distinctively; these post holders were generally Shafi‘is and the majority belonged to the indigenous civilian elite. The *khaṭīb*ship especially, throughout the various locations (see fig. 6 with sources), was dominated by members of grand Hamawian families. Among these were names of families introduced previously such as the Banū al-Bahrānī and the Banū al-Bārīzī.

Another name emerging from the list are the Banū al-Mughayzil (cf. fig. 7), a “grand household”¹¹⁰ of the town whose members reappear frequently as *khaṭīb*s, especially in the central mosque of the upper town, the Great or Upper Mosque (al-jāmi‘ al-kabīr/al-a‘lá). The origins of this family are not clear, as they did not attract the interest of the authors of contemporary chronicles or biographical dictionaries. However, it is obvious that it was—or had recently become—an indigenous Hamawian family by the mid-seventh/thirteenth century. Family members rarely rose to prominence in other Syrian towns and focused their career patterns typically on Ḥamāh. The family’s head, Muḥammad ibn Muḥammad ibn Naṣr Allāh, was seemingly the muḥtasib of the town, although he is only mentioned in the biographies of his sons.¹¹¹ His sons started to rise to prominence in the late Ayyubid and early Mamluk period and Badr al-Dīn ‘Abd al-Laṭīf¹¹² (d. 690/1291), for instance, was nominated khaṭīb in the Upper Mosque. His two sons Mu‘in al-Dīn Abū Bakr¹¹³ (d. 724/1324) and Bahā’ al-Dīn ‘Abd al-Ṣamad¹¹⁴ (d. 725/1325) followed respectively. Further *khaṭīb*s emanating from this family are Badr al-Dīn’s grandson Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn Yūsuf¹¹⁵ (d. 719/1319), who was attached to a place that is not specified, and his nephew Zayn al-Dīn Muḥammad (d. 699/1299)¹¹⁶ in the Lower Mosque (al-jāmi‘ al-asfal), the central mosque of the lower town. Together with Badr al-Dīn’s three brothers, the family was able to fill religious posts and offices in different branches of the town’s civil administration to an impressive extent.

Tāj al-Dīn Aḥmad (d. 687/1288),¹¹⁷ the eldest of the four brothers, became the town’s shaykh al-shuyūkh, i.e., the head of the mystical milieu of the town who represented its interests vis-à-vis the political elite. In general the shaykh al-shuyūkh was chosen from the grand families of a town (in Aleppo, for instance, the Banū al-‘Ajāmī and in Damascus the Banū Ḥamawayh)¹¹⁸ because his influence transcended the mystical milieu considerably. Tāj al-Dīn was able to pass the post on to his sons, which reflected also the active marriage policy of the al-Mughayzil family: his son Nāṣir al-Dīn ‘Abd al-Raḥīm¹¹⁹ (d. 707/1307) had been married to a daughter of Tāj al-Dīn’s predecessor in this post, Sharaf al-Dīn ‘Abd al-‘Azīz al-Anṣārī (d. 662/1263),¹²⁰ the son of Ibn al-Raffā’, the town’s previous Shafī‘ī judge, who is mentioned above.

Two other brothers of Badr al-Dīn chose careers in the town’s civil administration. Najm al-Dīn ‘Abd al-Ghuffār¹²¹ (d. 688/1289–90) became kātib al-darj, working for both al-Malik al-Manṣūr II Muḥammad and his son al-Malik al-Muẓaffar III Maḥmūd (d. 698/1299), and acquired sufficient wealth to set up several endowments. Sharaf al-Dīn ‘Abd al-Karīm¹²² (d. 697/1297) was appointed assistant to the treasurer (wakīl bayt al-māl). The administrative role of the family was continued by two individuals mentioned above: Badr al-Dīn’s son Bahā’ al-Dīn ‘Abd al-Ṣamad, who was the vizier of the town and Nāṣir al-Dīn’s son Nūr al-Dīn ‘Alī al-Muẓaffarī (d. 701/1301),¹²³ the author of the supplement to Ibn Wāṣil’s Mufarrij al-Kurūb fī Akhbār Banī Ayyūb, who was appointed as kātib al-dīwān in 682/1283–4. After the early eighth/fourteenth century no member of the Banū al-Mughayzil held any further positions of importance in Ḥamāh and this local family ceased to play a prominent role.

LOCAL ELITE FAMILIES BEYOND FORMAL POSITIONS

Not all the grand families that emerged in Ḥamāh during the late sixth/twelfth century and flourished from the early seventh/thirteenth century onwards necessarily occupied civilian posts in great number. However, the rise of these families was also a consequence of the urban renaissance that provided a framework for alternative ways to acquire a standing in the town. These alternatives were based on the usage of cultural and/or economic capital. In comparison to the families discussed hitherto, social capital in the sense of activating the networks of the town’s civilian elite in order to acquire posts played only a secondary role.¹²⁴ A typical example of this are the Shafī‘ī Banū Qarnāṣ (cf. fig. 8 with sources), a “renowned family,”¹²⁵ which possessed its *zāwiyah*¹²⁶ and whose members are called “grandee”¹²⁷ or “notable”¹²⁸ of the town. A number of them were renowned scholars, especially in the field of hadith, who never took any formal positions, such as Ṣafī al-Dīn Aḥmad (b. 510/1117), Muḥammad ibn Hibat Allāh (d. 637/1239), Sharaf al-Dīn ‘Abd al-‘Azīz (d. 654/1256–57), Nāṣir al-Dīn Muḥammad (d. 662/1264), Muwaffaq al-Dīn Muḥammad (fl. 678/1279–80), and Shihāb al-Dīn ‘Abd al-Raḥīm (d. 700/1300–1). Only a few members held religious/civilian posts, such as Mukhlīṣ al-Dīn Ismā‘īl (d. 659/1261), a teacher both in the “Jāmi‘ Ḥamāh” and the Madrasah al-Mukhliṣīyah, and Faṭḥ al-Dīn (d. 730/1329–30), who held the trusteeship (nazr) in the central mosque of Ḥamāh.

The main exception to the family’s focus on scholarly activities was Mukhliṣ al-Dīn Ibrāhīm (d. 648/1248), the founder of the Madrasah al-Mukhliṣīyah. He later played an active political role in Homs, which started in a somewhat unfortunate manner as he was imprisoned by the town’s ruler al-Malik al-Mujāhid Asad al-Dīn (r. 581–637/1186–1240). The imprisonment of both him and other members of the Banū Qarnāṣ was a consequence of the aborted ruse by Sayf al-Dīn ‘Alī al-Hadhabānī, the strongman of Ḥamāh under al-Malik al-Muẓaffar II Maḥmūd. Al-Hadhabānī undertook with a number of Hamawian notables a feigned flight from Ḥamāh to Homs on the pretence of seeking the support of Asad al-Dīn. Asad al-Dīn saw through the stratagem and imprisoned al-Hadhabānī and his companions on the spot.¹²⁹ Nevertheless, Mukhliṣ al-Dīn was more fortunate than al-Hadhabānī and a number of notables who perished in captivity. Released by Asad al-Dīn’s successor, al-Malik al-Manṣūr Ibrāhīm (r. 637–44/1240–46), he made a career in the town’s administration. He became vizier and de facto regent of al-Manṣūr’s son, al-Malik al-Ashraf Mūsá (r. 644–62/1246–63).¹³⁰

The Banū Qarnāṣ did not base their role within the civilian elite exclusively on intensive scholarly activities, i.e., the activation of cultural capital, and occasional political involvement. Rather, they are a typical example of the families who also profited from the economic development of the town from the late sixth/twelfth century onwards. Jamāl al-Dīn ‘Abd al-Raḥmān (d. 673/1274), for instance, was only described as a “notable of his town” because he had an outstanding fortune at his disposal.¹³¹ Owing to this wealth of the family, Zayn al-Dīn Ismā‘īl (d. between 635/1238 and 642/1244), one of the town’s grand estate owners, played a central role in the conflict between the town’s landed elite and its ruler al-Malik al-Nāṣir Qiliḡ Arslān. When the latter came to power in 617/1221 he obliged the inhabitants of Ḥamāh to buy overpriced wheat. Zayn al-Dīn refused and fled to Egypt and al-Nāṣir had his house destroyed and his estates confiscated. Seemingly his family had, owing to weak integration into the town’s administration, insufficient standing to settle the affair through local mechanisms of conflict resolution. Zayn al-Dīn was only able to recover his estates when al-Malik al-Kāmil of Egypt enthroned his candidate in the town, al-Nāṣir’s brother al-Malik al-Muẓaffar II Maḥmūd. However, after al-Kāmil’s death in 635/1238 Zayn al-Dīn was imprisoned, where he died.¹³²

A second example of a grand family of the town that did not hold civilian posts in considerable number is the Banū Rawāḥah (cf. fig. 9),¹³³ who gained in strength starting in the mid-sixth/twelfth century. This family originated from Ḥamāh, but its members appear in a number of different Syrian and Egyptian towns. They display a focus on scholarship mixed with some commercial activities and involvement in administrative posts comparable to the profile of the Banū Qarnāṣ. The family started to rise to prominence with ‘Abd Allāh ibn al-Ḥusayn ibn Rawāḥah (d. 561/1165), the renowned khaṭīb of Ḥamāh.¹³⁴ His son Jamāl al-Dīn al-Ḥusayn (d. 585/1189–90) left the town for Damascus and Egypt where he studied hadith, was imprisoned for an extended period in Sicily, and finally died a martyr below the walls of Frankish Acre.¹³⁵ Jamāl al-Dīn’s sons, ‘Izz al-Dīn ‘Abd Allāh (d. 646/1248)¹³⁶ and Nafīs al-Dīn Muḥammad (d. 642/1245),¹³⁷ both dwelled in Ḥamāh and were hadith scholars who were renowned well beyond the confines of their hometown. Nafīs al-Dīn’s daughter Fāṭimah (d. 716/1316–17), who played a crucial role among the town’s hadith scholars, subsequently continued this tradition of hadith scholarship.¹³⁸ Jamāl al-Dīn’s brother Muḥammad (d. 631/1233)¹³⁹ and their nephew Zakī al-Dīn Hibat Allāh (d. 622/1225) exemplify the trading activities of the family.¹⁴⁰ Both seem to have left Ḥamāh and were active in Aleppo and Damascus where Zakī al-Dīn endowed madrasahs.¹⁴¹ Mainly remembered for holding civil posts are Nūr al-Dīn Aḥmad (d. 712/1312), kātib al-inshā’ in Tripoli, who only returned to Ḥamāh shortly before his death,¹⁴² and Zayn al-Dīn ‘Abd al-Raḥmān (d. 722/1322–3), secretary in the Upper Egyptian

town of Asyūt.¹⁴³

From the sixth/twelfth century onwards, the Banū Qarnāṣ and especially the Banū Rawāḥah rose beyond the confines of the town to a considerably larger extent than the families discussed above. Focusing on scholarly and trading activities they had to seek contacts in the Egyptian and Syrian lands. A middle-sized town such as Ḥamāh did not offer the family members sufficient opportunity to pursue their careers. As these families did not seek civilian posts—or were not able to attain them—they chose the more promising cosmopolitan outlook. Nevertheless, they were firmly grounded in the town that offered, owing to its cultural and economic development, ample resources from which they could draw. In this sense they complete the picture of the town's local elite during the Ayyubid and Mamluk periods.

CONCLUSION

Two principal points emerge from the analysis of the Hamawian civilian elite in comparison with the development of the civilian elite in other towns during the period: the importance of the household in structuring the civilian elite and the ability of the Hamawian families to close their social universe to outsiders until the mid-eighth/fourteenth century.

Starting with Lapidus, the household has been increasingly defined as the basic unit for exercising power during the Ayyubid and Mamluk periods.¹⁴⁴ Chamberlain in particular has stressed the household's role in the post-Saljuq states, which were characterized by a low number of state agencies and autonomous corporate or religious bodies in both rural regions and urban centers.¹⁴⁵ Military and civilian households alike took charge of most of the administrative functions that were still hardly specialized and often applied on an ad-hoc basis. The Hamawian civilian elite discussed in this article was, similar to that in the region's large cities, structured according to such households. Only those functions that were at the very core of political power, such as the vizierate, were generally beyond the reach of these households.¹⁴⁶ The Hamawian families tended to some kind of ¹⁴⁶ Viziers in Ḥamāh who were not attached to the grand families of the town include for example: Shihāb al-Dīn Asʿad ibn Yaḥyá (d. 614/1217) (al-Dhahabī, Tārīkh, vol. 621–30:101–2 and 183–84; al-Ṣafadī, Al-Wāfi, 9:32–34); ʿAlāʾ al-Dīn ʿAlī ibn Muḥammad (d. 674/1275) (al-Dhahabī, Tārīkh, vol. 671–80:164); Abū al-Ḥasan al-Ḥalabī, vizier under al-Malik al-Manṣūr II Muḥammad (d. 683/1284) (al-Yūnīnī, Dhayl Mirʾāt al-Zamān, 3:147–48); Ṣafī al-Dīn Naṣr Allāh ibn Muḥammad (d. 683/1284) (al-Dhahabī, Tārīkh, vol. 681–90:173 and al-Yūnīnī, Dhayl Mirʾāt

division of labor: the judgeship was largely the domain of the Banū al-Bahrānī, Wāṣil, and al-Bārīzī; the Banū al-Mughayzil played a salient role in the *khaṭīb*ship; administrative posts that went to the grand families were dominated by the Banū al-Mughayzil and al-Bārīzī; and finally the Banū Qarnāṣ and Rawāḥah were main actors in the transmission of knowledge.

It is not evident how these families put this division of labor into practice or, in other words, in which ways or by what means they conducted the struggle over posts and influence. The only indicators available to us are appointments to the judgeship. It has been shown above that the turnover in the post was relatively low during the period of the local elite. Also of relevance is whether new judges were appointed upon the death of the previous post holder or whether their predecessor was deposed. Between 617/1220 and 764/1363, i.e., the period of the local elite, the large majority of judges died in office and deposition was a rather rare occurrence. These two characteristics of appointments to the judgeship indicate that, compared with a town such as Damascus, the division of labor among the grand households secured a larger degree of social stability within the civilian elite.¹⁴⁷ Thus, we encounter in Ḥamāh the household as the typical basic unit of social organization, but the tight networks of this middle-sized town seem to have prevented social strife to a considerable extent.

The second point emerging from the comparison of Ḥamāh with other cities was the ability of the Hamawian families to close their social universe to outsiders during the period of the local elite. Studies of Cairo and Damascus have shown that scholars from outside the respective town played a considerable role within the civilian elites.¹⁴⁸ Yet in Ḥamāh cosmopolitans ceased to take a prominent position within the social fabric during the hegemony of the town's households in the local period. One explanation for the salience of local scholars is that a post in such a minor town was simply not prestigious enough for cosmopolitan scholars, especially those of greater standing. The case of the aforementioned judge Muḥammad ibn ʿAlī al-Anṣārī, who later moved on to Egypt, shows that the judgeship of Ḥamāh was not necessarily perceived as the climax of one's ¹⁴⁷ On the fitnah among the civilian households in Damascus cf. Chamberlain, Knowledge. In Ḥamāh in the above-mentioned period Shafīʿi judges died in office on eight occasions (nos. 7a, 9a, 10, 12, 14, 15, 16, and 17 in fig. 1) and were deposed on three occasions (nos. 9, 11, and 13 in fig. 1).

career. His successor al-Qāsim Ibn al-Shahrazūrī was even criticized for “lack of ambition” for taking up a post in such a minor town.¹⁴⁹ Like the renowned Damascene scholar Ibn ‘Abd al-Salām (d. 660/1262), who refused the invitation of al-Malik al-Nāṣir (d. 656/1258) of al-Karak to join him at his court somewhat indignantly with the words “Your lands are too small for my knowledge” and moved on to Egypt,¹⁵⁰ many scholars from inside and outside the town preferred not to continue their careers in the province.¹⁵¹ Whenever scholars of greater standing came to reside in the town for a longer period, they were mostly scholars of the rational sciences. These scholars found a particularly receptive climate for pursuing their careers in the town during the seventh/thirteenth century.¹⁵²

However, while the comparatively low reputation of Ḥamāh might have facilitated the control of the town’s posts by the local elite, this did not entirely exclude outside scholars, who played a role before and after this local period. In order to understand the local elite’s capacity to dominate the distribution of the town’s positions a further characteristic of Ḥamāh is of relevance: its prolonged status as a semi-autonomous principality, first within the Ayyubid family confederation and subsequently within the Mamluk Empire. The local elite flourished some decades after the town’s first Ayyubid ruler al-Malik al-Muẓaffar I ‘Umar came to power in 574/1178. The economic ascent of the region, which was a prerequisite for the development of the local elite, took a decisively local turn with the consolidation of the town’s autonomy. It was the following period of some 150 years of nearly uninterrupted autonomy that offered the local elite the political framework necessary for its development. The end of this local period followed the political development again with some delay: after the absorption of the Hamawian principality within the Mamluk Empire in the 730s/1330s, it took further decades until the dominance of the local elite on the town’s posts was weakened. The local families either changed their profile to a cosmopolitan ¹⁵¹ A typical example of this is Taqī al-Dīn Muḥammad al-‘Āmirī al-Ḥamawī (d. 680/1281) who excelled in his hometown at the age of 18 years, was appointed professor in the Ashrafiyah in Damascus, and finally as chief judge in Cairo (al-Dhahabī, Tārīkh, vol. 671–80:365–67; al-Ṣafadī, Al-Wāfi, 3:18–19).

Al-Āmidī was a theologian with a brilliant reputation in the rational sciences who had to flee Egypt due to accusations of heresy (Ibn Wāṣil, Mufarrij, 4:78 and 80).
